CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

CONTAINING

THE PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF THE

SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESS, THIRD SESSION.

VOLUME XLIX.

WASHINGTON:
1913.

VOLUME XLIX, PART III.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESS, THIRD SESSION.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, January 26, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. FITZGERALD.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we realize that there are problems of life which have not been solved by reason or the subtle methods of logic.

But we bless Thee for those qualities of soul—faith, hope, and love—which solve all doubt, all fear in an infinite Father who has never failed his children. We are here to-day because Thou hast taken from us a servant of the people.

Warm in his friendships, strong in his convictions, earnest in his endeavors to fulfill the obligations of life in his home, his State, and Nation.

> There are nettles everywhere,
> But smooth green grasses are more common still;
> The blue of heaven is larger than the cloud.

Strengthen our faith, quicken our hopes, glorify our love, that we, with his dear ones, may go forward without fear to the larger life which waits on Thy children, where all questions will be solved, doubts dissipated, and harmony prevail in every heart. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will cause the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday to be read.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the Journal. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The Clerk will read the special order for to-day.

Ordered, That Sunday, January 26, 1913, at 12 o'clock m., be set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of Hon. GEORGE R. MALBY, late a Representative from the State of New York.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

House resolution 795.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. GEORGE R. MALBY, late a Member of this House from the State of New York.

Resolved, That as a special mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public career the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to deliver a studied eulogy on our lamented colleague, but rather to pay a heartfelt tribute to one who was my very dear, very close, friend. My acquaintance with Mr. MALBY did not extend over a long period of years. In fact, I had no personal acquaintance with him until his arrival in Washington at the opening of the Sixtieth Congress. I knew him by reputation and was proud when he chose to number me among his friends. Our acquaintance at once ripened into a genuine and lasting friendship and affection, which continued without a cloud until his sudden and untimely departure last July.

> I can not say, and I will not say
> That he is dead—he is just away.
> With a cheery smile and wave of the hand,
> He has wandered into an unknown land,
> And left us dreaming how very fair
> It needs must be since he lingers there.

Surely these lines of James Whitcomb Riley must have been written especially for dear Uncle George. There is no living person but remembers him in the best of health and spirits. He left Washington early in July with kindly wishes and goodbyes for everyone and went to New York. He greeted all that he met there jovially and pleasantly, said that he was tired of the long drawn-out session and warm weather, and was so very glad that he was going home. He knew that he would be all right when he once more reached his own town of Ogdensburg and breathed the invigorating air of his native country, his beautiful land of the St. Lawrence River. No man ever lived that was more appreciative, more full of sentiment in regard to his own people, his wife, his lads, as he called them, and his well-beloved home.

Mr. MALBY was a real American, of Scotch descent, and justly proud of his lineage. Many are the reminiscences and interesting tales that he has related to me about his people and the early days of his life. He had a wonderful sense of humor and a way of expressing things with a chuckle all his own. It was my great privilege to have been his traveling companion in the early days of our friendship, and, as such, his continued courtesy and kindliness made our association a more than happy one. I shared his stateroom all the way to Panama and back on one occasion and enjoyed every minute of it. His friendship to me is one of the brightest spots in my life, and I can not in words express how greatly I miss him now. "The heart can feel what the lips can not utter." While he was several years my senior and had accomplished much, he was never too busy or too much occupied with his own affairs to pause willingly and cheerfully and listen to my minor trials and tribulations and help me all he could.

I wish to acknowledge my deep sense of gratitude and obligation to him for the always wise counsel and advice he affectionately imparted. He was a man of sterling qualities and noble impulses, made innumerable friends and always kept them. He was as true as steel. He had no devious ways, he was straight from the shoulder, always steadfast and sincere, clear and forceful, brusque sometimes to almost sternness, but underlying all was one of the sweetest, most affectionate natures God ever gave to man.

Just to exchange morning greetings with him always helped me out a lot—sort of seemed to make the whole world brighter, to sweeten things and make them more endurable. He was most unostentatious, never aspiring to the limelight of display of any kind. When he spoke in the House it was always because he was either for or against a measure, not for oratorical effect. He was no grandstand player. He was direct and resolute. All who came in contact with him were at once impressed with his earnest manner, his unflinching honesty, and fearless defense of what he considered right. When he believed in a principle, he believed in it absolutely. He never compromised. His good Presbyterian faith and conscience always pointed the way, and when he once espoused a cause he never deserted it. When once convinced that a thing was right, he stood firm as adamant. His party faith was a part of his creed. He was a most unusual man, and it required an intimate knowledge of him to really appreciate him. His friendship and fidelity made me love him; to have been so closely allied with him these few short years, I count a priceless heritage.

He now sleeps quietly beneath the sod of his native State, still living in the hearts and minds of all who knew him. Their respect and confidence and love were his during his entire career. They revere him in death, and can say with truth, "Here lies a man who loved his fellows." The mysteries of God are unfathomable. The untimely cutting down of this man so dear to us is hard to reconcile. His loss seems unpayable, irreparable. Let consolation be our antidote for grief. He is home, while we are still upon our stumbling journey, and though his voice is forever stilled and no more in this life will we feel his presence, somewhere he will wait for us, some day we will join him.

> O Lord of Light, steep thus our souls in Thee,
> That when the daylight trembles into shade,
> And falls Thy silence of mortality,
> And all is done, we shall not be afraid,
> But pass from light to light, from earth's dull gleam,
> Into Thy very heart and heaven of our dream.
> —Gildey.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of hesitation that I undertake to present to this House something of the career and services of the late GEORGE R. MALBY, my predecessor in this body. Mr. MALBY was born in the town of Canton, St. Lawrence County, N. Y., September 16, 1857, and passed away in the city of New York on the 5th of July, 1912, being at that time 55 years of age. His career in this House and the services which he rendered here were a part only of a long life of public service. It was the expansion and the flower, perhaps, of the labors which he had performed in his own State as a representative in the legislature of that State of a part of the congressional district which he here represented. He was educated at St. Lawrence University; he studied law and practiced that profession in the city of Ogdensburg, and in 1890 he entered the Legislature of the State of New York as an assemblyman, succeeding the Hon. N. M. Curtis, who was for many years a distinguished Member of this body. During the few years in which he was a member of the lower house of our State legislature he occupied the various positions of leader of his party, chairman of important committees, and speaker of that body. After five years of service in the assembly of the State he was elected to the State senate, and continuously represented his senatorial district there until he was chosen a Representative in Congress for the twenty-sixth district of New York. During the years in which Mr. MALBY was a member of the State legislature the State of New York went through a condition of transition in its business affairs. It grew from small to great things. He was identified with the labors of the bodies of which he was a member for 16 years, and in a great part was responsible for the policies there inaugurated and for the carrying out of those policies. He was responsible for the institution of the great college of agriculture at Cornell in so far as it grew to what it now is—a great institution of learning. It was by reason of his deep interest in the subject, having been born a farmer's boy, that he had said to me and had said to others that when the time came, if he had the power to do something for the farming interests which would be far-reaching, which would help to elevate and lift and enlarge the scope, interest, power, and value of the industry of agriculture, that he should do it; and in the course of his legislative career the opportunity came, and, perhaps almost by himself, he succeeded in establishing on a firm foundation that greatest institution of its sort in America or in the world.

During those years, Mr. Speaker, the State of New York, in its financial development, was substituting a system of indirect for direct taxation, and during those years Mr. MALBY gave his time unsparingly and with great effect to assisting and developing that system in our State. It was appreciated by the people, it was appreciated by the legislature, and he grew before he left the senate of our State to be the predominant personage in that body, the one man, I think, in the whole legislature in his last term, who was consulted on every important topic and without whose advice nothing serious was undertaken. That was a preparation for service to his district, to his State, and to the people of the United States which qualified him beyond any man we ever sent from our locality, and I believe fairly beyond any man whom the State of New York has sent to the Congress of the United States in many years.

You are familiar with his position in this House. We have believed that he had made extraordinary progress in influence and power in the comparatively few years that he had been a Member of the House of Representatives. He had the confidence, I believe, of the leaders of this House on both sides. He had the respect, he had the affection of every man who knew him. His death was a tremendous shock to the community from which I come. No public man in my time has passed away and left behind such deep regret, so much of sadness, so much of a feeling of personal loss, as was felt when we heard that Mr. MALBY had passed away. He was the friend of all his people; he was consulted in a thousand ways. Not only was his position at the bar a distinguished one, but in the long years of public service he had rendered to thousands of people personal service, personal kindness, acts of thoughtfulness and consideration, acts rendered without a thought of a reward, of a return of favor, acts which came from his great heart and great brain, and splendid character and disposition, which had endeared him to our people as no other man has ever been endeared, so far as the records of our country go. And when I say "our country," I mean that northern section of the State of New York, which, to those who have been born and brought up there, is the dearest spot on earth.

It is very hard to be reconciled to such bereavements, particularly when they have a personal touch and come close to one. Numbers of men have associated with Mr. MALBY, not only in this body, but in the other bodies to which he had at times belonged, and have had the same feeling toward him that I am trying to express here—confidence, respect, and love.

Death comes to all. It is the most natural thing in the world. It is the thing easiest to understand in a way. We grieve, we must grieve, we ought to grieve, but we must bear our bereavements, our disappointments, and our griefs, as Christian men. I believe that if Mr. MALBY had been spared, all the service and experience which he had gone through as a public servant would have proven but the beginning, the foundation of more distinguished work and of greater usefulness. I know that he appreciated the opportunities of office from that standpoint, which is a good, sound, American standpoint. It was the opportunity to serve and not to receive the idle honor of the place.

As the gentleman who preceded me has said, he never made a speech for oratorical effect, he never thought anything of personal advantage. According to his lights, according to his conscience and his judgment, he always did what he regarded as his full duty as a public servant. It will be many years before such a man will represent our people, combining, as he did, the qualities of statesman, public man, good citizen, and loyal friend.

He will not be forgotten among those who have known him as we knew him. Thousands will possess the same feeling as was expressed by Burns in his "Ode to Glencairn":

The bridegroom may forget the bride
Was made his wedded wife yestreen;
The monarch may forget the crown
That on his head an hour has been;
The mother may forget the bairn
That smiles sae sweetly on her knee;
But I 'll remember thee, Glencairn,
And a' that thou hast done for me!

[Mr. MERRITT at this point assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.]

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Speaker, the death of Mr. MALBY was so sudden and unexpected that it was a great shock to each one of us. It was one of the many instances that have occurred during this Congress to remind us of the uncertain tenure of human life.

Mr. MALBY had a distinguished career in the Legislature of New York before he came to Washington as a Representative in Congress. I first met him at Albany when he was the leader of his party in the Senate of the State of New York, and it is not overstating the fact to say that few men at that time possessed a greater influence than he in the public affairs of the State.

I did not have the privilege of intimate personal acquaintance with him, but I know the value of his service here and the efficient work which he performed so ably and so well as a Member of this body.

He was true to the people whom he represented; he was loyal to their interests; he was uncompromising in his convictions of public duty. The death of a man of such wide experience, strength of mind, and decision of character can not but be a positive and serious loss to his district, to his State, and to the membership of this House.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, I have been deeply impressed with what I have listened to here to-day at this special session of the Members of the House of Representatives, called for the purpose of doing honor to the memory of our late brother, Congressman GEORGE R. MALBY. I have hesitated to take part in these services, not because I do not believe in the custom which is responsible for this gathering, not because I am not desirous of paying tribute to Congressman MALBY's worth as a man, as a friend, as a citizen, and as a public servant, but because I feel utterly incapable of portraying him as I really knew him, and because I realize that I lack the power of expression to correctly let the public see, as I should like to have it see, the finer, nobler, grander qualities that made such a deep impress upon me. It is one thing to know a man and to recognize his splendid attributes, but it is another thing to have the ability that shall make others see as you yourself have seen. Just as we admire in a beautiful picture the genius of the artist and yet are powerless to reproduce the painting, so sometimes in a friend we may see noble qualities, qualities that attract and make everlasting impress, qualities that arouse great admiration and deep regard, and yet be unable to portray those qualities to our own satisfaction. It is because I feel that I can not do Congressman MALBY justice that I must be content to say that, while there are others here to-day who knew him far better than I, others who had greater opportunity to measure his public usefulness, I do not believe he had in all the world a friend—and this is a strong statement, because I know the standard of his friendships—who placed a higher estimate upon his value to the country that he was serving so earnestly, so ably, and so faithfully, or who held him in kindlier regard.

New York has sent to the Congress of the United States many men of great note. It has sent men who have achieved reputations which will last as long as fame shall last, but among all its list of distinguished men it will be hard to find any who by reason of natural fitness, of patriotic motive, and of real unassuming ability are better entitled to a wreath of commendation than the Hon. GEORGE R. MALBY.

Congressman MALBY and I came to Congress at the same time. I had known him before coming here because of his long service at Albany, but I had seen but little of him. We located in the same hotel in Washington, and as I gradually became better acquainted with him I began to recognize his ability, his earnestness, his fairness, and his kindly, generous nature, a nature slow to think ill and tempered always with a mantle of charity broad enough for all humanity. At the Chicago convention, where we were fellow delegates, I saw him frequently. I congratulated him upon his apparent recovery from a long illness in Washington, and looked forward with great pleasure to seeing him here again this winter. But it was willed otherwise. The Grim Reaper beckoned our friend in the very height of his usefulness, and he went away, and when he went sorrow came not only to his wife and to all his family, but to all who knew his bigness of soul and heart and mind.

New York mourns the loss of a citizen who honored her in State and national life. Congressman MALBY's memory will be cherished not only by all friends and associates at the National Capital, but by all who knew him, and particularly by the people of his home city and home county, whom he loved better than all the world beside.

Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase!)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw, within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold:
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the Presence in the room he said,
"What writest thou?" The vision raised its head,
And with a look made of all sweet accord,
Answered, "The names of those who love the Lord."
"And is mine one?" said Abou. "Nay, not so,"
Replied the angel. Abou spake more low,
But cheerily still, and said, "I pray thee, then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow men."
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
It came again with a great awakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blessed,
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

[Mr. FITZGERALD addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. FITZGERALD at this point resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.]

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, a number of gentlemen desired to participate in the proceedings of to-day who are unavoidably absent. I therefore ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen so desiring may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD as part of the proceedings of this day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MERRITT] asks unanimous consent that gentlemen unavoidably absent to-day may have leave to extend in the RECORD their remarks as part of this day's proceedings. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD the proceedings of public memorial services held at Ogdensburg, N. Y., July 8, 1912, the day before Mr. MALBY's funeral.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MERRITT] asks unanimous consent to print as part of the proceedings of this day the addresses and proceedings of memorial services in the city of Ogdensburg at the time of the death of Mr. MALBY. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The proceedings are as follows:

[Public memorial services held at Ogdensburg, N. Y., July 8, 1912.]

"Hon. GEORGE E. VAN KENNEN, mayor of the city of Ogdensburg. Will the house please come to order. We have assembled here to-night to mourn the loss of one of our most distinguished citizens. I have been asked to preside upon this sad occasion.

"I assume that many speeches of eulogy will be made here to-night. I suppose that none of us knew how great a man Congressman MALBY was except those who saw him sitting among men whose names were household words in the land. I therefore move that the Chair appoint a committee of three to draft suitable resolutions of memorial.

"Motion seconded. Carried.

"Mr. VAN KENNEN. I will appoint upon that committee Mr. R. E. Waterman, Dr. Fred Van Dusen, and Dr. W. B. Hanbidge. I suggest that these gentlemen retire and consider the memorial that may be offered to this meeting later.

"Ladies and gentlemen, while we are waiting for the report of this committee we have thought it proper to have a few remarks made by our citizens with reference to the death of Senator MALBY, and I shall now take the liberty of calling upon Mr. Thomas Spratt to say a few words concerning him.

"Mr. SPRATT. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, the death of Mr. MALBY was a great shock, not only to this community but to the people of northern New York. To people generally, Mr. MALBY was enjoying his usual good health. We knew of the fact that he was attending to his duties in Congress, and that during the Republican convention, which was held at Chicago, he took a very important part in the councils of his party, and certainly it was like a bolt from a clear sky when it was announced in the various homes of the people here in Ogdensburg that he had passed to the unknown.

"Mr. MALBY as a young man came up on the farm; from the farm to the school, from the school to the university, from the university to the practice of the law. In fact, Mr. MALBY was a typical, ambitious young American. He practiced law for some years, and while living in Ogdensburg, attending to the duties of that profession, he became well acquainted with all of us, and that acquaintance became intimate in many instances, and to the bar of Ogdensburg he was always reckoned upon as one of the men that you could rely upon when it was necessary to make any extraordinary exertion. But it seemed as though fate had in store something other than the practice of the legal profession for Mr. MALBY, because after the late lamented Gen. Curtis decided to resign and ceased to be a candidate for the office of member of assembly, upon the meeting of the heads of the Republican Party of this district, although Mr. MALBY was not anxious for the position himself, he became, with the consent and at the request of his friends, a candidate for that office, and a very peculiar thing happened at that time. As I understand it, as I said before, Mr. MALBY, at that time was not anxious for this nomination. But the fact was that the men who represented another portion of the district urged his candidacy, and the advice was followed and Mr. MALBY was nominated. The responsibility of that nomination was laid upon the heads of the political leaders of the Republican Party at this end of the district, and the result was that a very excellent man at the other end of the district thought he had been wronged and that the people of Ogdensburg were rather inconsiderate, and many of us thought that when the courthouse was destroyed at Canton and an effort was made to bring it here by a number of our citizens we were unsuccessful by reason of a little resentment that was carried along, but the truth was that Mr. MALBY was in no way to blame for any misunderstanding, and the nomination was really brought about by men outside of the city of Ogdensburg. However, Mr. MALBY entered into the assembly; he remained there several years; he became the highest officer in that body; he was probably the strongest man there, and his nature, his mind, and his character is stamped upon the laws which were passed during the time that he was a member of that body, both as an ordinary member and as a leader of the house and as its speaker.

"I feel a great pleasure in knowing that, in the early days of Mr. MALBY's progress in the legislature, our Democratic friends had a great deal to do with giving him position. I remember very distinctly when Mr. Sheehan, who was the Democratic leader, had made up his committee and our friends thought that Mr. MALBY ought to be put on the committee on ways and means, Mr. Sheehan said: 'I will be very glad to help you, but the truth is that I have made up my committee, and I do not see how I can give so important a position to so young a member.' But, with the aid of our friends of the more southern portion of the State, he reversed his position, and Mr. MALBY was placed upon that important committee, and it gave him a great opportunity to impress the people on that committee with the extent of the ability which he had, and we were all very much pleased, and especially that it was one of the things that the Democrats in northern New York had performed.

"From the assembly he went to the senate. It is really unnecessary for me to recite what he accomplished there. He began at once to hold positions there on the most important committees. He was really the dominant figure in the great senate of the State of New York while he remained in that body, and after he was promoted to be a Member of Congress from this congressional district he took rank with the ablest men of the Nation. There was this about Mr. MALBY, perhaps you have never thought about it. He was a wonderful man in becoming acquainted and mingling with the great men wherever he was called. He seemed to understand that it was absolutely necessary, in order to make progress, to get with the body of men who would stand up and be able to express their ideas and always have ideas. So we find him in the assembly, senate, and Congress. The result was that Mr. MALBY, under Speaker CANNON, received recognition that no other new Member ever received in the House of Representatives. The good work he did there was appreciated by the Democrats, and at the time of his death no man stood higher in the House of Representatives than GEORGE R. MALBY.

"Now, gentlemen, it is very easy to say this man has done that, or the other man has done something else, but it is a very important thing, a wonderful thing, to find a man that is not only able to perform the acts that come to him, but who can go out among men who are seeking to rise to the front or to positions of various kinds and to so control and manage affairs that his party will not be separated or disintegrated, but that it will follow the leader. Now, GEORGE R. MALBY had that faculty to a great extent, which ability he showed in the halls of Congress. He had great ability in keeping his party together, in organizing his friends, in maintaining his party organization, and so he was not only a great legislator but he was a great statesman in the highest sense of the word.

"What is the value of such a life, or, rather, what is the loss to that community when such a man dies? You might say as to the value, he was elected as a member of assembly, and he performed well the duties of his office. He was made senator, and he never was found wanting. He was elevated to the halls of Congress, and he found his place among men. He was a valuable man in that way. On the other hand, you might say that 55 years ago there were a great many thousand people in northern New York—a great many thousand residing here in this congressional district. Let your mind run back for 50 years, those of you who are old enough, and scan the men who have lived and who have died and who are living now, and see how many George R. Malbys there are in northern New York now, and when you find how many there are you can tell somewhat of the greatness of this man and what this community has suffered by his death.

"I know there are other people who wish to speak of Mr. MALBY, but I wish to call your attention to another side of Mr. MALBY, and that was his kind-heartedness. He lived opposite to me for many years. I knew how much he loved his children and his neighbor's children. There was nothing in the world that pleased Mr. MALBY as much as to get the children of the neighborhood together, especially on the Fourth of July, when he would surround himself with his own children and my children and Mr. Hannan's children, and the thing that he most enjoyed was to come under my window with the children and fire off those giant firecrackers and then hear how the fathers of the children took it. And I tell you the man who can bring children to him and to whom children will go has a great and a good heart.

"Mr. MALBY was more than fortunate in his marriage. In the earlier days of his life it was a great benefit to him that he had, in Mrs. Malby, a true helpmate. She was a woman who was thoroughly devoted to her own household duties. She never allowed Mr. MALBY to be worried by small matters of one kind and another when he came home from his legislative duties, and she loved her husband beyond anything I can describe, and he certainly was a kind and loving husband. There was no wish of her's that he did not grant if it were possible. He was a kind and loving father, a beautiful husband, a man to whom we can all look up and say GEORGE R. MALBY was a truly representative man of northern New York.

"But he is gone, and what can we do for him? We can simply show by gathering together to-night our appreciation of his greatness and goodness. We can gather together to-morrow and close our places of business and be there present with his family and lay his body to rest on the shores of the Oswegatchie River which he loved so well.

"I wish to say that in the loss of Mr. MALBY the State of New York has lost an able citizen, his district has lost a good Representative, and the city has lost one of the best citizens it has ever produced and certainly the vacancy which is caused by his death will long remain unfilled.

"Mr. VAN KENNEN. I would like to call upon Hon. John M. Kellogg with reference to the man whose career has been closed.

"Hon. JOHN M. KELLOGG. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, Congressman MALBY was my dearest lifelong friend. It seems impossible that I can say anything here and it seems impossible for me to remain silent. Speaking of the man, it seems that he and I came to this town about the same time. I was a practicing lawyer, he was a boy beginning his studies. We found ourselves in the office of Stillman Foote, I a practicing lawyer, he my law student. Our relations were close and confidential. We stood shoulder to shoulder for a period of 20 years. If an assault was made upon one, there were always two to answer the call. He was faithful and firm in his friendship, unswerving in his loyalty. When I became supreme court judge my relations, as an active friend in politics with him ceased, but my interest in his career continued, our friendship remained and I think the various successes that have come to him in life furnished to me just as much satisfaction as they did to him.

"I speak of these things, first, because I can not help it; second, because it seems to me that I always knew the man and understood the man better than anybody else, aside from his own family, and I want to be on record as saying that that friendship has had an important bearing upon my life. His success in life did not arise from accident. It was from the inherent characteristics of the man himself. He was a great big man. A man absolutely self-reliant; honest to himself and friends; he acted upon his own judgment, and when he made up his mind that a thing ought to be done he did it. He had the courage of his convictions. A faithful, reliant man; honest in all the relations of life; loyal to his constituents and his friends. With the great big mind and the fact that when he was serving the public he believed that the public business was his business, he familiarized himself with the business of the State and the Nation as a business man familiarizes himself with the details of his own business. These qualities—the greatness of his mind, the perseverance and push of the man, and the good nature and general goodness—made him what he was. It seems to me that GEORGE R. MALBY stands as one of the greatest men that northern New York has known in our day.

"Mr. VAN KENNEN. I take the liberty of calling on Maj. William H. Daniels to say a few words with reference to the man who has brought nothing but honor to the section in which he lived.

"Maj. WILLIAM H. DANIELS. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I would much appreciate not having been called upon to-night after having listened to the two speeches that have been made. Knowing GEORGE R. MALBY as I knew him, he is entitled to all the praise that has been spoken in his behalf. I wish I could find words to tell of the strong friendship that existed between GEORGE R. MALBY and myself. I wish that I could find words to really express the deep feeling that I have over his loss. Mr. Chairman, you know and many others know that for a long number of years I was closely allied with Mr. MALBY in many ways, and I became well acquainted with him, and a strong friendship was formed between us, and it seemed that as year after year went by that friendship grew stronger and stronger.

"I do not feel like saying very much here to-night; I can not. Mr. Spratt spoke so nicely that while I feel we have met with a severe loss my thoughts go over to that other house where that dear wife and mother is sitting with her head bowed in grief surrounded by her two children, for we know that their loss is irreparable and our hearts go out to them. There are many things I would like to say, but I can not. It is hard to speak at all. GEORGE R. MALBY and I were warm friends, friends for years, and as I look back I see the many pleasant hours that I have spent with him and I realize now that he has gone. It strikes deeply into my heart and I think I may say that outside of his family I doubt if there is another person in the city to-night to whom his death has brought a keener sorrow than it has to me.

"But I wish to read a telegram that I received from Bishop Conroy just previous to my coming here.

"WATERTOWN, N. Y., July 8, 1912.

"Maj. W. H. DANIELS, Ogdensburg, N. Y.:

"Permit me to share, by telegram, in the public expression of honor to our late lamented Congressman. GEORGE MALBY was a big man in Ogdensburg, a bigger man in Albany, and bigger still in Washington; the abler his company and the broader his sphere, the more did his personal ability and broadness become manifest. His friend and fellow citizen, I regret him as a private and a public loss and I lay upon his bier the tribute of my esteem, gratitude, and sorrow. To his bereaved family I tender my sincerest sympathy.

"J. H. CONROY."

"Mr. VAN KENNEN. I will call upon Mr. Fred J. Gray.

"Mr. FRED J. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, the duty we are called upon to perform seems to be sad, yet it is entirely proper and fitting that we step aside and pay a slight tribute of our love and respect for that beloved member of this community, that distinguished neighbor, that honored citizen. There can be no eulogy pronounced commensurate with the ability, energy, and devotion that he gave to his public services, with that great heart overflowing with kindness and love to all, with that charity which so characterized his life.

"It was my good fortune to study law in his office, to be his student. It was there I first learned of Senator MALBY. He made the most humble who came into his presence his equal. He was never conscious of his position in life. He was a natural leader of men, not by imperious command but by that kindness, that quality of his nature which attracted men to him, and they followed him without leading.

"As it has been said, he started in life in an humble position—from the farm to the humble schoolmaster. By tireless energy and devotion to duty he continued until he became a member of the bar, and he soon rose in the estimation of the people and the legal fraternity until he was considered one of the leaders of the bar of northern New York. His wise counsel and sound judgment brought to him a large clientage, but later and very soon a wider field opened before him, and it has been said here, he was called to the Legislature of the State of New York, and by the same tireless energy and devotion to duty he won his way from place to place until he held almost every important position in the legislature of this great Empire State. Not an important statute, during the long years of his service in the legislature, was placed on our books, hardly an important measure passed the legislature that did not receive his approval. He was soon recognized in the legislature as one of the foremost and strongest minds, and was there given place. His counsel and advice were sought by men from all over the Empire State, and he became one of the strongest and ablest men in his party and in the State of New York. But soon again the field of opportunity widened, and notwithstanding the deep regret that he had in leaving the associations, leaving the ties which bound him to the State of New York, leaving the many friendships and the place where he had worked so long and known so well, yet when this position was offered him and he accepted a place in the Congress of the United States, the same tireless energy, the same devotion to duty, that same ability with which he had risen step by step through the Legislature of the State of New York, carried him upward and ever onward in the Halls of Congress, until he was known as, it has been said here to-night, one of the ablest and strongest legislators in the Legislature of our country.

"But that was not the greatest thing that Senator MALBY possessed. Not fame, honor, position, place, title, but kind words, kind and noble deeds survive. We who knew him best loved him most. He was happy when he was doing some person a kind act, and most unhappy when he was unable, by the influence of his position or otherwise, to grant the favor requested. That great heart went out in kindness and love to all. Sad, extremely sad his death; untimely, extremely untimely. At noonday, in the meridian of life, with full power directing every energy in the discharge of his public duties, radiant with hope and ambition, he entered the dawn of the eternal morning.

"The stricken and bereaved family have lost a devoted husband, a kind and loving father; this community a useful, valiant friend; this State a most able and honored son; this Nation a most wise and valiant counselor; and when we tenderly and lovingly lay him away and bid him our last farewell, we can not but exclaim—

> "The stately ships go on
> To their haven under the hill,
> But, oh, for the touch of a vanished hand
> And the sound of a voice that is still.

"Mr. VAN KENNEN. We have here present to-night Hon. E. C. Stewart, of Ithaca, who knew Senator MALBY a great number of years and who was attracted to him by his genial personality and who has come this distance to unite with us in paying tribute to his memory.

"Hon. E. C. STEWART. Mr. Mayor, ladies, and gentlemen, I am meeting with you to-night to express my deep sorrow at the loss which we have met. During my legislative experience, covering a period of 11 years, Senator MALBY was my dearest friend and my closest adviser. I think few of us here to-night appreciate the loss which has come upon us. Much of his work for the State is yet to develop. We of the southern tier, or southern portion of the State, appreciate particularly the great act which he performed in the interest of agriculture in establishing the State College of Agriculture. We know that, had it not been for his efforts, that great act never would have become a law. My first visit to your city was as the guest of Senator MALBY at the time the location for your State armory was selected. That, friends, is a period of nearly 20 years ago. I have in the meantime been his guest in your beautiful city.

"It is needless for me to try to express to you how much I shall miss him and how I enjoyed his friendship.

"Words fail me, friends, upon this occasion to fully express myself.

"Mr. VAN KENNEN. I desire to call upon Mr. M. R. Sackett to say a word with reference to Senator MALBY.

"Mr. M. R. SACKETT. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I would be very glad to lay a wreath of equal beauty with those already placed upon the bier of our dead friend.

"I recall, as it were yesterday, the first time I ever saw GEORGE R. MALBY. Some of you remember, along in the later eighties, when the district convention of the first district of this county was always held in Gouverneur, that there was a sharp judicial controversy in this county. In this convention there was a difference of opinion between the leaders from Ogdensburg and Gouverneur. By the way, I think there always was a difference of opinion between the leaders of these two communities. Hon. George M. Gleason, whom you all remember, who have been at all familiar with political affairs for the last 25 years, led one part of that convention and this young stripling from Ogdensburg led the other. I was there as an interested spectator. I had never seen the young man before to my knowledge. I was particularly struck with his presence, with his manner of putting the question, with his debate with Mr. Gleason touching the various points in the controversy.

"Not many years after that I was present in Gouverneur in the old Grand Army Hall when this same young man asked this district for the nomination to the legislature. He defeated two townsmen of Gouverneur, Hon. Daniel Rich, who had the town of Fowler, I think, and Hon. Newton Aldrich. I remember very distinctly that I was exceedingly glad on that occasion of the defeat of my townsmen, and as Judge Kellogg has well said, it turned out a magnificent thing for the first district of St. Lawrence and for the entire section of northern New York, and when I heard of the death of our distinguished friend it seemed as if everything had gone to pieces pretty much.

"During these 25 years which have gone I came to know Mr. MALBY in the many phases of his character, public and private. He became known to me. I think he trusted me. I think he valued my friendship. I certainly valued his, and there is no one that I know of in the world outside of my immediate family whom I can say was a better friend to me than was he. Dead at 55. His work all done. We were about the same age. Our tastes were alike in many respects. Dead at 55, and you say untimely. You say, what a short life. True it was short as we measure things; but when you think of the nonagenarians who have died, who have breathed and breathed and breathed, and then think of their lives, I tell you GEORGE R. MALBY, measured by that standard, has lived. It is not given to every man, it is only given to one now and then, to put himself into the innermost love of a people, of a community, and make them all mourners when he departs.

"I wonder if you have thought, Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, of the wreck and ruin in the lives of our noted men in the past 25 years. I recall in Gouverneur George H. Gleason, Newton M. Aldrich, Dr. McFalls; over in Potsdam there was that man whom you would think would live forever, Senator Erwin, John McIntyre, Judge Tappan; over in Canton the scholarly Russell, John Keeler, D. M. Robertson; here in your own city Charles A. Kellogg, Newton M. Curtis, and now, GEORGE R. MALBY. Truly, friends, there have been giants in St. Lawrence County. I have read about Silas Wright, Preston King, and Calvin T. Huribut. I knew A. X. Parker exceedingly well; I knew Judge Russell; I knew exceedingly well Mr. Littauer. These have all been Members of Congress representing this district, but I tell you I believe when we go far enough away from this day so that the perspective of history will tell the truth, GEORGE R. MALBY will stand out the peer of everyone.

"The other day, and it was only the other day, I came over the river to see him. I went up to his office over there, went into the back door, into the back room, shut the door and stayed there an hour and we talked and talked and talked, as friends will talk, and he told me a number of things, and he seemed so well and he looked so well and he looked so hearty and so healthy and so strong, and I remarked all of these things. Just the other day the news came that he was dead. On his way home to see us all. To see his home, and his wife, and his children. Died there in that hot hotel in that great city, all alone. And it seems so pitiful and so horrible and so sorrowful. That strong man with so many friends over all the State and Nation, and not one there to bring a cup of water or to hold his hand or to wipe away the death dew as he met the Destroyer. Alone! Alone!

"GEORGE R. MALBY was endowed with courage, and you who knew him, and I, can well believe that in that room there was no fear, no terror, except perchance that mere physical fear and terror which may come, but that great heart knew no terror. The lesson of this life has been told in fitting words. It ought to be an inspiration, particularly to the young men of St. Lawrence County. Typical American boy; born poor; born in the fresh air which is good; rising above obstacles, winning friends and honors. A marvelous career. A marvelous life. The country is richer for it. Youth is better, manhood is better, citizenship is better because GEORGE R. MALEY lived and worked. We sorrow, and have a right to sorrow. Great lessons remain and it is for us to learn the lessons which have been pointed out to us by wiser heads than mine; lessons which we must not throw away. American life is speeded up so high, we work so fast, we hurry, and the machinery of a physical frame that ought to run for years is speeded up until it breaks, so with our friend.

"Mr. VAN KENNEN. I take the liberty of calling upon Hon. E. A. MERRITT, Jr., of Potsdam, who has known Congressman MALBY for many years and has known how loyal he has always been to the cause he advocated.

"Hon. E. A. MERRITT, Jr. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, it is with a great deal of hesitation that I undertake to say anything. We are here, I take it, as the friends of Mr. MALBY. No more severe shock can come to this community or to this county than his unexpected departure. I can give no reason for it, no explanation. We must bear our loss with such fortitude as we can, with such fortitude as GEORGE MALBY would have borne a similar shock.

"I have known him in his public capacity and in his private life for many years. I owe him many kindnesses. I loved him. What can one say on such an occasion as this? All men fear death as children fear the dark, and yet it is the commonest thing in life, the commonest thing that we see, much less mysterious to me or my thought than life itself; explained in a thousand ways, a mystery; well, perhaps a mystery, because we know not what follows, but certainly simple in itself.

"For many years I have associated with Senator MALBY in public affairs. We were, I think, able to work together in the interest of our county and of this great country here that we call the north country. Much of such success as I have been able to attain has been due to his assistance. I have helped, as far as I could, in doing the things that he thought worth while. I believe that this is not a time to adequately at all discuss his public career or his services to this county. It is too near the hour of his departure. It requires some reflection and thought to arrange and marshal the facts. No man has ever lived in our community more typical of the ambitions, the labors, and the successes of the men who came from our community, a community which has changed but little since the first settlers came into this country and opened up the farms and settled them. Our people are now much the same as were their grandsires. There is some mixed blood in St. Lawrence County. Scotch and Irish and English and New Englander have made this county what it is; and of this mixture of blood and effort and service I think Mr. MALBY was the highest type and represented in his life all the phases that go to make up the citizenship of the North. His labors here will be appreciated more and more.

"The friends whom he has loved will cherish his memory with greater tenderness and regard from year to year. Although he passed away at an early age as compared with some men who have lived to the utmost span, he had, as has been said, accomplished much. My own feeling has always been one not only of personal affection but of a very high regard for his stanchness and courage. While it is a shock to think that when he passed he was alone, I do not believe that he was afraid. As men grow and live and suffer and succeed, he had no reason to be afraid. I know he never feared the face of any man, and I do not think he need fear anything else in heaven or on earth.

"Mr. VAN KENNEN. I venture to call upon Rev. A. M. Wight to say a word in reference to our esteemed friend, whose death has been such a distinct loss to the Nation, the State, and particularly to this north country.

"Rev. A. M. WIGHT. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, it is not for me to speak of the man who calls together this audience here to-night as one who knew him in the halls of the legislature or of Congress or even in the legal profession, for I knew him not in any one of these particulars; but from my deep heart I wish to lay a tribute with the others that we have listened to to-night to him as a man. For 15 years, going in and out and up and down our streets, I do not believe there was hardly one man in that walk and in the relationship, day by day, that so deeply impressed me as did that man. And I was thinking, while listening to these words of the men who had known him in the struggle of the political arena and known him so intimately in the citizenship of our city, of those words of Ralph Waldo Emerson—

"What you are speaks so loud, I can not hear what you say.

"There was a day, one year ago this month, that never will go out of my memory. Coming from my home on the west side to the center of the city, and about crossing Ford Street where it intersects with State Street, I heard my name called, and I turned and it was the voice of Senator MALBY. He said, 'Are you busy for a moment this morning?' I said I was not particularly. He said, 'Let us take a little walk,' and we took a little walk. We sat a little while on the veranda on this other corner, and there for a little while heart spoke to heart of the things that appertain to the other life. The honorable speaker that preceded me and others have intimated that GEORGE R. MALBY was not afraid to die. I know he was not, for he referred so tenderly to that scene when another gathering like this paid tribute to Gen. Curtis, and it was my privilege at that time, in the Presbyterian Church, to carry God's message of comfort to the sorrowing ones in prayer, and that man remembered the words of that prayer. And that is one thing I leave here to-night—the tribute to the man who was honest in his convictions and loyal to his principles. And I was reading this afternoon in Holy Writ of another gathering like unto this, and one said 'We shall miss him, for his seat will be vacant.' GEORGE R. MALBY's seat at Washington and in other gatherings here in our city will be vacant in the days to come. But it is for us to be thankful that we did know him and that God let him live. And truly to-night the earth is poorer and Heaven is richer, the one in losing and the other in receiving GEORGE R. MALBY.

"Mr. VAN KENNEN. Before calling for the report of the memorial committee I should like to ask if there is anyone else who would like to say a word in honor of our departed friend. I take the liberty of calling upon Col. Archie E. Baxter, of Elmira.

"Col. ARCHIE E. BAXTER. It has been truly said that nothing dies but that something mourns. When the humble, obscure citizen falls by the way, the household grieves; but when a man who has grown up in your midst from obscurity until he stood in the blazing limelight of publicity and known to all the world falls by the way the whole State mourns as the State of New York is buried in grief and is mourning bitterly for the death of GEORGE R. MALBY to-night.

"When I heard, unexpectedly, of the great loss that had fallen upon this community, it seemed as if death had entered my own home; that I heard the rustle of the dark wings and the cold waft of the shadow of death in my own household. I knew and loved him well.

"I chanced to be in New York when it was decided that he was not to be returned as speaker of the assembly. It was at the time a crushing disappointment. He said to me, 'Politics is an ungrateful business; I shall give it up.' I said, 'George, no; there is too much in you to be crushed by such a disappointment as this. There are great things ahead of you, but press forward manfully.' And there were great things ahead of him—Senator, Congressman, adviser of governors and Senators in the United States Senate, Congressmen. Presidents even took counsel from him. He was, perhaps, as has been well said, the ablest man among the many able sons that that grand old county of St. Lawrence has ever given birth to.

"I shall not, at this late hour, trespass upon your attention, and, as my friend the speaker has well said, this is not the time or the hour to enter into any lengthy eulogies of the life and of the services of GEORGE R. MALBY. That time will come later. But in the meantime we can all fittingly join with minds and hearts in paying some faint tribute to one we all loved so well, and to-morrow, when we tenderly lay him away amongst the evergreens and flowers, it will rise up in every heart to say, 'Farewell, farewell, oh, friend! May you rest in peace.'

"Mr. VAN KENNEN. I take the liberty of calling upon the memorial committee to report.

"Mr. WATERMAN. Mr. Chairman and friends, I fell this occasion most deeply; and if in reading this memorial which your committee has prepared I should hesitate and falter, I hope that you will forgive me. I shall do the best I can.

"The people of the city of Ogdensburg, gathered together by common impulse to commemorate the life and deeds of a brave and faithful public servant, who for more than a generation truly represented them in the councils of State and Nation, thereby reflecting great credit upon himself and those whose interests he held in sacred trust, desiring to perpetuate their action, do render this "TRIBUTE.

"A great man has departed from among us; great in intellect; great in heart; great in all things that make for better conditions in the world; a lawyer and lawmaker of commanding ability; a statesman of rapidly increasing power and influence. In the pride of a splendid manhood, with a future looming large in the foreground, and a political horizon commensurate with his genius, GEORGE R. MALBY surrendered his life to his duty on the conceded threshold of greater achievement. Born in the home town of Silas Wright, educated within sight of the grave of that illustrious patriot, he early conceived those lofty ideals which molded his after life and conduct. Most men are ambitious. This man was no exception to the rule. Many seek to gratify their ambitions at the expense of others. This man never did. He scorned to rise upon the shoulders of other men. Rather would he put his own shoulder at the service of some one less fortunate. His was one of those big, generous natures that love peace and order and harmony. But he could strike and strike hard in what he believed to be a righteous cause; and when he was aroused he moved with a dynamic directness and precision that crushed opposition. And he was independent in thought and action. He made this plain at the beginning of his public career at Albany, and later in the halls of Congress at Washington it was abundantly demonstrated. There never was any indecision about him or any doubt about where he stood in matters of public concern. GEORGE R. MALBY was born great. Whenever he appeared one knew intuitively that this was no ordinary man. His presence commanded immediate and respectful attention, and brought to mind the lines of Sir Walter Scott:

"When as the Palmer came in hall,
Nor lord, nor knight, was there more tall,
Or had a statelier step withal,
Or looked more high or keen.

"Always serene, self-poised in victory and defeat alike, with unfaltering step he moved steadily onward and upward in the service of his people, knowing no distinction save only that of right and wrong. With him it was justice on the one side and injustice on the other. The line was sharply drawn. There was no middle ground of expediency or compromise. And he was modest. No man in public life used the first personal pronoun less frequently. It was his strong, forceful individuality, never self-assertive, that brought him to the fore in every enterprise in which he was engaged.

"The outside world knew him as the lawyer and statesman and respected and honored him as such. We, who are here assembled, knew him as a friend and neighbor, and we loved him. He is gone. We shall never again clasp his hand or look into his kind and sympathetic face. But such men do not die. They vanish in the concrete form, and that is all. One of his distinguished predecessors in the councils of the Nation, the late William H. Seward, was fond of repeating the following lines of unknown origin:

"There is no death; the stars go down
To rise upon some fairer shore.
And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
They shine forevermore.

"There is no death; an angel form
Walks o'er the earth with silent tread.
He bears our best-loved things away,
And then we call them dead.

"Born into that undying life,
They leave us but to come again;
In all, in everything, the same,
Except in grief and pain.

"And ever near us, though unseen,
The dear immortal spirits tread.
For all the boundless universe is life;
There are no dead.

"So shall we think of him in loving remembrance, not as dead, but as living and breathing in his works, and in the shining example of faith and courage which he has left us, a rich heritage for all the years to come.

"Mr. VAN KENNEN. Having heard the memorial resolutions, there being no objection thereto, I declare the same adopted.

"What is the further pleasure of the meeting?

"Mr. SPRATT. I move that the meeting adjourn.

"Maj. DANIELS. Second the motion.

"Mr. VAN KENNEN. It is moved and seconded that we adjourn. Carried."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In accordance with the resolution previously adopted the Chair declares the House adjourned until 12 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Monday, January 27, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

FRANK O. BRIGGS, a Senator from the State of New Jersey, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

HOMESTEAD ENTRYMEN IN NORTH IDAHO (S. DOC. NO. 1037).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. GALLINGER) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a statement showing by what authority of law and reason of facts there is inserted in patents issued to certain homestead entrymen in north Idaho a clause making the patents and the title of the entrymen subject to the application and rights of the Washington Water Power Co., which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

DISEASES AMONG INDIANS (S. DOC. NO. 1038).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report prepared by the United States Public Health Service in accordance with the act approved August 24, 1912, of the investigations into the prevalence of contagious and infectious diseases among the Indians of the United States, which, with the accompanying paper and illustrations, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, schedules of papers, books, and so forth, in the Interior Department not needed in the transaction of public business and of no historical or permanent value. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments. The Chair appoints as the committee on the part of the Senate the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. CLARKE, and the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. BURNHAM. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives of the appointment of the Committee on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. J. Res. 380. Joint resolution authorizing the granting of permits to the committee on inaugural ceremonies on the occasion of the inauguration of the President-elect on March 4, 1913, etc., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution:

S. 2666. An act granting an increase of pension to William P. Clark; and

S. J. Res. 145. Joint resolution to provide for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property in connection with the presidential inaugural ceremonies in 1913.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 23451) to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties, and other claims for damages to and loss of private property.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, each with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

S. 7160. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 8034. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 8035. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 3967. An act granting an increase of pension to John R. Fugill;

H. R. 27806. An act granting a pension to Mary MacArthur;

H. R. 27874. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 28282. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 28379. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 2666. An act granting an increase of pension to William P. Clark;

S. 6380. An act to incorporate the American Hospital of Paris;

H. R. 23451. An act to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties;

S. J. Res. 145. Joint resolution to provide for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property in connection with the presidential inaugural ceremonies in 1913; and

H. J. Res. 210. Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint a member of the New Jersey and New York Joint Harbor Line Commission.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations held at Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called illiteracy-test amendment to the immigration bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented memorials of the congregations of the Seventh-day Adventist Churches of Stillwater, Litchfield, Foldahl, Hutchinson, Pipestone, Mankato, and Alexandria, all in the State of Minnesota, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation compelling the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Minneapolis Drug Co. of Minnesota, praying for the repeal of the duty on sponges, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Local Branch No. 28, National Association of Letter Carriers, of St. Paul, Minn., favoring the enactment of legislation providing compensation to Federal employees injured in the line of duty, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRISTOW presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Salina, Kans., remonstrating against the parole of Federal life prisoners, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 459, Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union, of Caldwell, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called agricultural extension bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Ransom, Kans., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation authorizing the Government of the United States to issue bonds for the loan of money to the farmers of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented memorials of the congregations of the Seventh-day Adventist Churches of Great Bend and Pleasanton, in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation compelling the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Baldwin City, Kans., and a petition of sundry citizens of Mound Valley, Kans., praying for the passage of the so-called Kenyon-Sheppard interstate liquor bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Lawrence, Kans., praying that an investigation be made into the refusal of the Department of the Interior to permit the leasing of Osage Indian lands to the Uncle Sam Oil Co., etc., which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CUMMINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 25002) to amend section 73 and section 76 of the act of August 27, 1894, reported it with amendment and submitted a report (No. 1159) thereon.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Finance, I report the bill (H. R. 12813) to refund duties collected on lace-making and other machines and parts or accessories thereof imported subsequently to August 5, 1909, and prior to January 1, 1911, without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 1160) thereon. I ask that the report of the House committee be printed as the Senate report to accompany the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

INAUGURAL CEREMONIES.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 380) authorizing the granting of permits to the committee on inaugural ceremonies on the occasion of the inauguration of the President-elect on March 4, 1913, and so forth, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

I was authorized by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report this House joint resolution with an amendment providing that one of the spaces in the city of Washington, namely, that opposite the south front of the Treasury Building, should be set apart for the use of the Woman Suffrage Association upon the occasion of their pageant on the 3d day of March. But I was further instructed by the committee that if satisfactory arrangements were made in the meantime with the Secretary of War and the inaugural committee by which the ladies could have the use of this space, then I was to withhold that amendment. Those satisfactory arrangements have been made, and I am in receipt of letters, both from the War Department and from the chairman of the inaugural committee, to that effect. Therefore, in accordance with the instructions of the committee, I report the joint resolution without amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let us have it read. I have not the slightest idea what is in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PANAMA CANAL TRAFFIC AND TOLLS.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Printing I report favorably, with amendments, Senate concurrent resolution 33, providing for the printing, binding, and distribution of 6,000 copies of the Report upon Panama Canal Traffic and Tolls, prepared by Emory R. Johnson, special commissioner, and I ask for its present consideration.

The amendments were, in line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "six" and insert "four," and in line 11, after the words "House of Representatives," to strike out "and 3,000 shall be delivered to the superintendent of the House document room for distribution" and insert "and 1,000 for the use of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate," so as to make the concurrent resolution read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there shall be printed and bound in cloth, with accompanying maps, 4,000 copies of the Report upon Panama Canal Traffic and Tolls, prepared for the President by Emory R. Johnson, special commissioner on traffic and tolls; that the copies here ordered shall be printed from plates recently prepared for the Isthmian Canal Commission and now in the possession of the Government Printing Office; and that of the copies printed 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 for the use of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate.

The amendments were agreed to.

The concurrent resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

STATUE OF THOMAS JEFFERSON.

Mr. SWANSON, from the Committee on Industrial Expositions, to which was referred Senate resolution 407, providing for the appointment of a committee of Senators to attend and represent the Senate at the unveiling and dedication of a memorial statue to Thomas Jefferson at St. Louis, Mo., on April 30, 1913, in commemoration of the acquisition of the Louisiana Territory, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas the president of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Co. has informed the Senate that with the approval of Congress, as expressed by an act of March 4, 1909, the Louisiana Purchase Exposition has erected upon the site of the World's Fair in the city of St. Louis a memorial to Thomas Jefferson at a cost of $450,000, in commemoration of the acquisition of the Louisiana Territory; and

Whereas this statue of Mr. Jefferson is to be unveiled and dedicated on the one hundred and tenth anniversary of the signing of the Louisiana Purchase treaty, the 30th of April, 1913; and

Whereas the trustees in charge of this great memorial have, through the president of the exposition company, requested the presence of a committee of the United States Senate to participate in the dedicatory services on the day named: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of Senators, to be composed of Mr. ROOT of New York, chairman of the Committee on Industrial Expositions; Mr. BACON of Georgia, and Mr. GALLINGER of New Hampshire, the Presidents pro tempore of the Senate; Mr. MARTIN of Virginia; Mr. CUMMINS of Iowa; Mr. REED of Missouri; Mr. NELSON of Minnesota; and Mr. STONE of Missouri, be appointed to attend and represent the Senate in the unveiling and dedication of said memorial.

CAROLINE O. BALLARD.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution No. 439, to pay to Caroline O. Ballard a sum equal to six months' pay of her late husband, William S. Ballard, a Senate messenger, submitted by Mr. PENROSE on the 23d instant, reported it without amendment.

CONTRIBUTIONS FOR CAMPAIGN PURPOSES.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution No. 418, amending Senate resolution No. 79, agreed to August 26, 1912, submitted by Mr. CLAPP on the 6th instant, reported it without amendment.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR JEFF DAVIS.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution No. 425, authorizing the Secretary of the Senate to pay the actual expenses incurred by the committee attending the funeral of the late Senator JEFF DAVIS, submitted by Mr. BRISTOW on the 7th instant, reported it without amendment.

MEMORIAL SERVICES FOR THE LATE VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution No. 435, setting apart a day for appropriate exercises in commemoration of the life, character, and public services of the late Vice President, submitted by Mr. CUMMINS on the 18th instant, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

Mr. McCUMBER. On behalf of the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who is necessarily absent from the Senate, I introduce two bills, which I ask may be read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McCUMBER (for Mr. CURTIS):

A bill (S. 8276) granting a pension to Emily C. Thompson; and

A bill (S. 8288) granting an increase of pension to Eliza A. Foulkes (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 8289) granting an increase of pension to Ralph Kent, jr. (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 8290) for the erection of a public building at Washington, Ind.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 8291) granting an increase of pension to Bernhardt R. Britton; and

A bill (S. 8292) granting an increase of pension to Margaret Kuster; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $80,000 for improving the harbor at New Haven, Conn., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey submitted an amendment providing for the further improvement of the Hudson (North) River channel of New York Harbor, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also submitted an amendment relative to the compensation of letter carriers in the City and Rural Delivery Services and clerks in the first and second class post offices who are injured while performing their duties, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas submitted an amendment providing for the revetment and improvement of the right bank of the Mississippi River near North Helena, Ark., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $30,000 for completing the work now being done in protecting the north bank of Arkansas River in front of the Crawford County levee, south of Van Buren, and so forth, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRONNA submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 for the establishment of a national game preserve, to be known as the North Dakota National Game Preserve, upon the land embraced within the boundaries of the Sully's Hill National Park, N. Dak., and so forth, intended to be proposed by him to the agriculture appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHIVELY submitted an amendment proposing to change the location and straighten the course of the channel of the Grand Calumet River through the lands of the Gary Land Co. and the Indiana Steel Co., and so forth, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 for payment of salaries of employees and other expenses of advertisement and sale in connection with the disposition of the unallotted lands and other tribal property belonging to the Five Civilized Tribes, and so forth, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make a per capita payment of such amounts as he may deem advisable to the enrolled members of the Five Civilized Tribes entitled under existing laws to share in the funds of those tribes, and so forth, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to expend $10,000 out of any funds in the Treasury belonging to the Choctaw Tribe of Indians of Oklahoma, for the use and benefit of the Old Goodland Indian Industrial School near Hugo, Okla., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment providing for the expenses incident to and in connection with the collection of rents of unallotted lands and tribal buildings, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRANE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,500 to pay to the town of Winthrop, Mass., being one-half of the cost of a sidewalk and edgestones to be constructed on that portion of Revere Street abutting the Fort Banks Military Reservation, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

CANCELLATION OF HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Mr. PERKY. I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 442), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to advise the Senate whether or not the department contemplates the cancellation of any homestead entries upon any of the United States reclamation projects in Idaho because of the failure of entrymen to make payment covering the operation and maintenance charges, and if so, the names of the entrymen and a description of the location of their entries.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if he has received any intimation that such a move was to be made on the part of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. PERKY. I have received information in regard to the matter from very reliable sources and from associations whose membership is directly interested in the subject.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the resolution again read, as I did not hear the first part of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

ERNEST C. STAHL.

Mr. CATRON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 7620) for the relief of Ernest C. Stahl was indefinitely postponed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. CATRON. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND LETTERS.

Mr. ROOT. A few days ago the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] asked that an order be entered to recall from the House the bill (S. 4355) incorporating the National Institute of Arts and Letters, and the bill (S. 4356) incorporating the National Academy of Arts and Letters. I move that the votes by which the bill (S. 4355) incorporating the National Institute of Arts and Letters was passed be reconsidered, and that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROOT. From the Committee on the Judiciary, I report favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 18841) incorporating the National Institute of Arts and Letters. The bill is identical with the Senate bill which has just been postponed indefinitely, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, unless it is absolutely necessary that the matter be disposed of immediately, I should like to see what the bill is before we act upon it.

Mr. LODGE. The request is simply to substitute the House bill for the Senate bill which has passed the Senate. The bills are identical. The Senate bill was recalled from the other House on my motion to permit the substitution to be made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Very well.

Mr. SHIVELY. I ask that the bill be read, and I understand the Senator from New York to say that the bill is identical with the one which passed the Senate and that the only purpose of this movement is to expedite its final passage.

Mr. ROOT. Precisely.

Mr. SHIVELY. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from New York, I made the request that the bill (S. 4355) incorporating the National Institute of Arts and Letters and the bill (S. 4356) incorporating the National Academy of Arts and Letters be recalled from the House. I ask that the order recalling Senate bill 4356 be vacated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection that order will be made.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 26680) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WETMORE. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and accede to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. WETMORE, and Mr. FOSTER the conferees on the part of the Senate.

AMERICAN HOSPITAL OF PARIS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 6380) to incorporate the American Hospital of Paris, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House, and agree to the same.

J. H. GALLINGER.
CHARLES CURTIS,
THOMAS S. MARTIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
HENRY D. CLAYTON,
JOHN W. DAVIS,
JOHN A. STERLING,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

IMMIGRATION OF ALIENS.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the bill (S. 3175) entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States" having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out the text inserted by the House amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the word 'alien' wherever used in this act shall include any person not a native born or naturalized citizen of the United States, or who has not declared his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States in accordance with law; but this definition shall not be held to include Indians not taxed or citizens of the islands under the jurisdiction of the United States That the term 'United States' as used in the title as well as in the various sections of this act shall be construed to mean the United States and any waters, territory, or other place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, except the Isthmian Canal Zone; but if any alien shall leave the Canal Zone and attempt to enter any other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, nothing contained in this act shall be construed as permitting him to enter under any other conditions than those applicable to all aliens. That the term 'seaman' as used in this act shall include every person signed on the ship's articles and employed in any capacity on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place.

"That this act shall be enforced in the Philippine Islands by officers of the General Government thereof designated by appropriate legislation of said Government.

"SEC. 2. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a tax of $5 for every alien, including alien seamen regularly admitted as provided in this act, entering the United States. The said tax shall be paid to the collector of customs of the port or customs district to which said alien shall come, or, if there be no collector at such port or district, then to the collector nearest thereto, by the master, agent, owner, or consignee of the vessel, transportation line, or other conveyance or vehicle bringing such alien to the United States, or by the alien himself if he does not come by a vessel, transportation line, or other conveyance or vehicle. The tax imposed by this section shall be a lien upon the vessel or other vehicle of carriage or transportation bringing such aliens to the United States, and shall be a debt in favor of the United States against the owner or owners of such vessel or other vehicle, and the payment of such tax may be enforced by any legal or equitable remedy. That the said tax shall not be levied on account of aliens who shall enter the United States after an uninterrupted residence of at least one year, immediately preceding such entrance, in the Dominion of Canada, Newfoundland, the Republic of Cuba, or the Republic of Mexico, nor on account of otherwise admissible residents of any possession of the United States, nor on account of aliens in transit through the United States, nor upon aliens who have been lawfully admitted to the United States and who later shall go in transit from one part of the United States to another through foreign contiguous territory: Provided, That the Commissioner General of Immigration, under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, by agreement with transportation lines, as provided in section 23 of this act, may arrange in some other manner for the payment of the tax imposed by this section upon any or all aliens seeking admission from foreign contiguous territory: Provided further, That said tax, when levied upon aliens entering the Philippine Islands, shall be paid into the treasury of said islands, to be expended for the benefit of such islands: Provided further, That in the cases of aliens applying for admission from foreign contiguous territory and rejected, the head tax collected shall upon application be refunded to the alien: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to aliens arriving in Guam or Hawaii; but if any such alien, not having become a citizen of the United States, shall later arrive at any port or place of the United States on the North American Continent the provisions of this section shall apply.

"SEC. 3. That the following classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission into the United States: All idiots, imbeciles, feeble-minded persons, epileptics, insane persons, and persons who have been insane within five years previous; persons who have had one or more attacks of insanity at any time previously; paupers; persons likely to become a public charge; professional beggars; vagrants; persons afflicted with tuberculosis in any form or with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease; persons not comprehended within any of the foregoing excluded classes who are found to be and are certified by the examining surgeon as being mentally or physically defective, such mental or physical defect being of a nature which may affect the ability of such alien to earn a living; persons who have committed a felony or other crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude; polygamists, or persons who admit their belief in the practice of polygamy; anarchists, or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or of all forms of law, or who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized government, or who advocate the assassination of public officials; persons who are members of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or who advocate or teach the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character; prostitutes, or women or girls coming into the United States for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; persons who procure or attempt to bring in prostitutes or women or girls for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; persons who are supported by or receive in whole or in part the proceeds of prostitution; persons hereinafter called contract laborers, who have been induced, assisted, encouraged, or solicited to migrate to this country by offers or promises of employment, whether such offers or promises are true or false, or in consequence of agreements, oral, written or printed, express or implied, to perform labor in this country of any kind, skilled or unskilled; persons who have come in consequence of advertisements for laborers printed, published, or distributed in a foreign country; persons who have been deported under any of the provisions of this act, and who may again seek admission within one year from the date of such deportation, unless prior to their reembarkation at a foreign port the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall have consented to their reapplying for admission; persons whose ticket or passage is paid for with the money of another, or who is assisted by others to come, unless it is affirmatively and satisfactorily shown that such person does not belong to one of the foregoing excluded classes; persons whose ticket or passage is paid for by any corporation, association, society, municipality, or foreign Government, either directly or indirectly; stowaways, except that any such stowaway may be admitted in the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor; all children under 16 years of age, unaccompanied by one or both of their parents, at the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor or under such regulations as he may from time to time prescribe; persons who can not become eligible, under existing law, to become citizens of the United States by naturalization, unless otherwise provided for by existing agreements as to passports, or by treaties, conventions, or agreements that may hereafter be entered into. The provision next foregoing, however, shall not apply to persons of the following status or occupations: Government officers, ministers or religious teachers, missionaries, lawyers, physicians, chemists, engineers, teachers, students, authors, editors, journalists, merchant, bankers, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure, nor to their legal wives or their children under 16 years of age who shall accompany them or who subsequently may apply for admission to the United States, but such persons or their legal wives or foreign-born children who fail to maintain in the United States a status or occupation placing them within the excepted classes shall be deemed to be in the United States contrary to law, and shall be subject to deportation as provided in section 19 of this act.

"That after four months from the approval of this act, in addition to the aliens who are by law now excluded from admission into the United States, the following persons shall also be excluded from admission thereto, to wit:

"All aliens over 16 years of age, physically capable of reading, who can not read the English language, or some other language or dialect, including Hebrew or Yiddish: Provided, That any admissible alien or any alien heretofore or hereafter legally admitted, or any citizen of the United States, may bring in or send for his father or grandfather over 55 years of age, his wife, his mother, his grandmother, or his unmarried or widowed daughter, if otherwise admissible, whether such relative can read or not; and such relatives shall be permitted to enter. That for the purpose of ascertaining whether aliens can read the immigrant inspectors shall be furnished with slips, of uniform size, prepared under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, each containing not less than 30 nor more than 40 words in ordinary use, printed in plainly legible type in the various languages and dialects of immigrants. Each alien may designate the particular language or dialect in which he desires the examination to be made, and shall be required to read the words printed on the slip in such language or dialect. No two aliens coming in the same vessel or other vehicle of carriage or transportation shall be tested with the same slip. That the following classes of persons shall be exempt from the operation of the illiteracy test, to wit: All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that they are seeking admission to the United States solely for the purpose of escaping from religious persecution; all aliens in transit through the United States; all aliens who have been lawfully admitted to the United States and who later shall go in transit from one part of the United States to another through foreign contiguous territory: Provided, That nothing in this act shall exclude, if otherwise admissible, persons convicted of an offense purely political, not involving moral turpitude: Provided further, That the provisions of this act relating to the payments for tickets or passage by any corporation, association, society, municipality, or foreign Government shall not apply to the tickets or passage of aliens in immediate and continuous transit through the United States to foreign contiguous territory: Provided further, That skilled labor, if otherwise admissible, may be imported if labor of like kind unemployed can not be found in this country, and the question of the necessity of importing such skilled labor in any particular instance may be determined by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor upon the application of any person interested, such application to be made before such importation, and such determination by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to be reached after a full hearing and an investigation into the facts of the case; but such determination shall not become final until a period of 30 days has elapsed. Within three days after such determination the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall cause to be published a brief statement reciting the substance of the application, the facts presented at the hearing and his determination thereon, in three daily newspapers of general circulation in three of the principal cities of the United States. At any time during said period of 30 days any person dissatisfied with the ruling may appeal to the district court of the United States of the district into which the labor is sought to be brought, which court or the judge thereof in vacation shall have jurisdiction to try de novo such question of necessity, and the decision in such court shall be final. Such appeal shall operate as a supersedeas: Provided further, That the provisions of this law applicable to contract labor shall not be held to exclude professional actors, artists, lecturers, singers, ministers of any religious denomination, professors for colleges or seminaries, persons belonging to any recognized learned profession, or persons employed strictly as personal or domestic servants: Provided further, That whenever the President shall be satisfied that passports issued by any foreign Government to its citizens or subjects to go to any country other than the United States or to any insular possession of the United States or to the Canal Zone are being used for the purpose of enabling the holder to come to the continental territory of the United States to the detriment of labor conditions therein, the President shall refuse to permit such citizens or subjects of the country issuing such passports to enter the continental territory of the United States from such other country or from such insular possessions or from the Canal Zone: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent, hinder, or restrict any alien exhibitor, or holder of a concession or privilege for any fair or exposition authorized by act of Congress, from bringing into the United States, under contract, such alien mechanics, artisans, agents, or other employees, natives of his country, as may be necessary for installing or conducting his exhibit or for preparing for installing or conducting any business authorized or permitted under any concession or privilege which may have been or may be granted by any such fair or exposition in connection therewith, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, may prescribe both as to the admission and return of such persons: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to accredited officials of foreign Governments nor to their suites, families, or guests: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall exclude the wife or minor children of a citizen of the United States.

"SEC. 4. That the importation into the United States of any alien for the purpose of prostitution, or for any other immoral purpose, is hereby forbidden; and whoever shall, directly or indirectly, import, or attempt to import, into the United States any alien for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose, or shall hold or attempt to hold any alien for any such purpose in pursuance of such illegal importation, or shall keep, maintain, control, support, employ, or harbor in any house or other place, for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose, any alien, in pursuance of such illegal importation, shall in every such case be deemed guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not more than 10 years and by a fine of not more than $5,000. Jurisdiction for the trial and punishment of the felonies hereinbefore set forth shall be in any district to or into which said alien is brought in pursuance of said importation by the person or persons accused, or in any district in which a violation of any of the foregoing provisions of this section occur. That any alien who shall, after he has been excluded and deported or arrested and deported in pursuance of the provisions of this act which relate to prostitutes, procurers, or other like immoral persons, attempt thereafter to return to or to enter the United States shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not more than two years. In all prosecutions under this section the testimony of a husband or wife shall be admissible and competent evidence against a wife or husband.

"SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful for any person, company, partnership, or corporation, in any manner whatsoever, to prepay the transportation or in any way to induce, assist, encourage, or solicit the importation or migration of any contract laborer or contract laborers into the United States, unless such contract laborer or contract laborers are exempted under the provisions of section 3 of this act, and for every violation of any of the provisions of this section the person, partnership, company, or corporation violating the same shall forfeit and pay for every such offense the sum of $1,000, which may be sued for and recovered by the United States, or by any person who shall first bring his action therefor in his own name and for his own benefit, including any such aliens thus offered or promised employment as aforesaid, as debts of like amount are now recovered in the courts of the United States; or for every violation of the provisions hereof the person violating the same may be prosecuted in a criminal action for a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term of not less than six months nor more than two years; and under either the civil or the criminal procedure mentioned separate suits or prosecutions may be brought for each alien thus offered or promised employment as aforesaid.

"SEC. 6. That it shall be unlawful and be deemed a violation of section 5 of this act to induce, assist, encourage, or solicit any alien to come into the United States by promise of employment through advertisements printed, published, or distributed in any foreign country, whether such promise is true or false, and either the civil or the criminal penalty imposed by said section shall be applicable to such a case: Provided, That States or Territories, the District of Columbia, or places subject to the jurisdiction of the United States may advertise, and by written or oral communication with prospective alien settlers make known, the inducements they offer for immigration thereof, respectively.

"SEC. 7. That it shall be unlawful for any person, association, society, company, partnership, corporation, or others engaged in the business of transporting aliens to the United States, including owners, masters, officers, and agents of vessels, directly or indirectly, by writing, printing, or oral representation, to solicit, invite, or encourage any alien to come into the United States, and anyone violating any provision hereof shall be subject to either the civil or the criminal prosecution prescribed by section 5 of this act; or if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that any owner, master, officer, or agent of a vessel has brought or caused to be brought to a port of the United States any alien so solicited, invited, or encouraged to come by such owner, master, officer, or agent, such owner, master, officer, or agent shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located or in which any vessel of the line may be found the sum of $400 for each and every such violation; and no vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while the fine imposed remains unpaid; nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such questions upon the deposit with the collector of customs of a sum sufficient to cover such fine: Provided further, That whenever it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that the provisions of this section are persistently violated by or on behalf of any transportation company, it shall be the duty of said Secretary to deny to such company the privilege of landing alien immigrant passengers of any or all classes at United States ports for such a period as in his judgment may be necessary to insure an observance of such provisions: Provided further, That this section shall not be held to prevent transportation companies from issuing letters, circulars, or advertisements confined strictly to stating the sailings of their vessels and terms and facilities of transportation therein.

"SEC. 8. That any person, including the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any vessel, who shall bring into or land in the United States, by vessel or otherwise, or shall attempt, by himself or through another, to bring into or land in the United States, by vessel or otherwise, or shall conceal or harbor, or attempt to conceal or harbor, or assist or abet another to conceal or harbor in any place, including any building, vessel, railway car, conveyance, or vehicle, any alien not duly admitted by an immigrant inspector or not lawfully entitled to enter or to reside within the United States under the terms of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment for each and every alien so landed or brought in or attempted to be landed or brought in.

"SEC. 9. That it shall be unlawful for any person, including any transportation company other than railway lines entering the United States from foreign contiguous territory, or the owner, master, agent, or consignee of any vessel, to bring to the United States any alien afflicted with idiocy, insanity, imbecility, epilepsy, tuberculosis in any form, or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was afflicted with any of the said diseases or disabilities at the time of foreign embarkation, and that the existence of such disease or disability might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person or transportation company, or the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any such vessel, shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $200 for each and every violation of the provisions of this section. It shall also be unlawful for any such person to bring to any port of the United States any alien afflicted with any mental or physical defect of a nature which may affect his ability to earn a living, as contemplated in section 3 of this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was so afflicted at the time of foreign embarkation, and that the existence of such mental or physical defect might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $25 for each and every violation of this provision. It shall also be unlawful for any such person to bring to any port of the United States any alien who is excluded by the provisions of section 3 of this act because unable to read or who can not become eligible, under existing law, to become a citizen of the United States by naturalization, as provided in section 3 of this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that these disabilities might have been detected by the exercise of reasonable precaution prior to the departure of such aliens from a foreign port such person shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $100 for each and every violation of this provision. And no vessel shall be granted clearance papers pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while the fine remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such questions upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine and costs, such sum to be named by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

"SEC. 10. That it shall be the mandatory and unqualified duty of every person, including owners, officers, and agents of vessels or transportation lines, other than those lines which may enter into a contract as provided in section 23 of this act, bringing an alien to any seaport or land border port of the United States to prevent the landing of such alien in the United States at any time or place other than as designated by the immigration officers, and the failure of any such owner, officer, or agent to comply with the foregoing requirements shall be deemed a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine in each case of not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment; or, if in the opinion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor it is impracticable or inconvenient to prosecute the owner, master, officer, or agent of any such vessel, a pecuniary penalty of $1,000 shall be a lien upon the vessel whose owner, master, officer, or agent violates the provisions of this section, and such vessel shall be libeled therefor in the appropriate United States court.

"SEC. 11. That whenever he may deem such action necessary the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, detail immigrant inspectors and matrons of the United States Immigration Service for duty on vessels carrying immigrant or emigrant passengers, or passengers other than first and second cabin passengers, between ports of the United States and foreign ports. On such voyages said inspectors and matrons shall remain in that part of the vessel where immigrant passengers are carried. It shall be the duty of such inspectors and matrons to observe such passengers during the voyage, and report to the immigration authorities in charge at the port of landing any information of value in determining the admissibility of such passengers under the laws regulatng immigration of aliens into the United States. It shall further be the duty of such inspectors and matrons to observe violations of the provisions of such laws and the violation of such provisions of the "passenger act" of August 2, 1882, as amended, as relate to the care and treatment of immigrant passengers at sea, and report the same to the proper United States officials at ports of landing. Whenever the Secretary of Commerce and Labor so directs, a surgeon of the United States Public Health Service, detailed to the Immigration Service, not lower in rank than a passed assistant surgeon, shall be received and carried on any vessel transporting immigrant or emigrant passengers, or passengers other than first and second cabin passengers, between ports of the United States and foreign ports. Such surgeons shall be permitted to investigate and examine the condition of all immigrant and emigrant passengers in relation to any provisions of the laws regulating the immigration of aliens into the United States and such provisions of the "passenger act" of August 2, 1882, as amended, as relate to the care and treatment of immigrant passengers at sea, and shall immediately report any violation of said laws to the master or commanding officer of the vessel, and shall also report said violations to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor within 24 hours after the arrival of the vessel at the port of entry in the United States. Such surgeon shall accompany the master or captain of the vessel in his visits to the sanitary officers of the ports of call during the voyage, and, should contagious or infectious diseases prevail at any port where passengers are received, he shall request all reasonable precautionary measures for the health of persons on board. Such surgeon on arrival at ports of the United States shall also, if requested by the examining board, furnish any information he may possess in regard to immigrants arriving on the vessel to which he has been detailed. While on duty such surgeons shall wear the prescribed uniform of their service and shall be provided with first-class accommodations on such vessel at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. For every violation of this section any person, including any transportation company, owning or operating the vessel in which such violation occurs shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the next United States port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each and every day during which such violation continues, the term "violation" to include the refusal of any person having authority so to do to permit any such immigrant inspector, matron, or surgeon to be received on board such vessel, as provided in this section, and also the refusal of the master or commanding officer of any such vessel to permit the inspections and visits of any such surgeon, as provided in this section, and no vessel shall be granted clearance papers pending the determination of the question of the liability of such fine, or while it remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of all such questions upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fines and costs, such sum to be named by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

"SEC. 12. That upon the arrival of any alien by water at any point within the United States on the North American Continent from a foreign port or a port of the Philippine Islands, Guam, Porto Rico, or Hawaii, or at any port of the said insular possessions from any foreign port, from a port in the United States on the North American Continent, or from a port of another insular possession of the United States, it shall be the duty of the master or commanding officer, owners, or consignees of the steamer, sailing, or other vessel having said alien on board to deliver to the immigration officers at the port of arrival lists or manifests made at the time and place of embarkation of such alien on board such steamer or vessel, which shall, in answer to questions at the top of said list, contain full and accurate information as to each alien as follows: Full name, age, and sex; whether married or single; calling or occupation; personal description (including height, complexion, color of hair and eyes, and marks of identification); whether able to read; nationality; country of birth; race; country of last permanent residence; name and address of the nearest relative in the country from which the alien came; seaport for landing in the United States; final destination, if any, beyond the port of landing; whether having a ticket through to such final destination; by whom passage was paid; whether going to join a relative or friend, and if so, what relative or friend, and his or her name and complete address; whether ever before in the United States, and if so, when and where; whether ever in prison or almshouse or an institution or hospital for the care and treatment of the insane or supported by charity; whether a polygamist; whether an anarchist; whether a person who believes in or advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law, or who disbelieves in or is opposed to organized government, or who advocates the assassination of public officials, or is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or who advocates or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character; whether coming by reason of any offer, solicitation, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to perform labor in the United States; the alien's condition of health, mental and physical; whether deformed or crippled, and if so, for how long and from what cause; and such master or commanding officer, owners, or consignees shall also furnish information in relation to the sex, age, class of travel, and the foreign port of embarkation of arriving passengers who are United States citizens. That it shall further be the duty of the master or commanding officer of every vessel taking passengers from any port of the United States on the North American Continent to a foreign port or a port of the Philippine Islands, Guam, Porto Rico, or Hawaii, or from any port of the said insular possession to any foreign port, to a port of the United States on the North American Continent, or to a port of another insular possession of the United States to file with the immigration officials before departure a list which shall contain full and accurate information in relation to the following matters regarding all alien passengers, and all citizens of the United States or insular possessions of the United States departing with the stated intent to reside permanently in a foreign country, taken on board: Name, age, and sex; whether married or single; calling or occupation; whether able to read; nationality; country of birth; country of which citizen or subject; race; last permanent residence in the United States or insular possessions thereof; if a citizen of the United States or of the insular possessions thereof, whether native born or naturalized; intended future permanent residence; and time and port of last arrival in the United States or insular possessions thereof; and such master or commanding officer shall also furnish information in relation to the sex, age, class of travel, and port of debarkation of the United States citizens departing who do not intend to reside permanently in a foreign country, and no master of any such vessel shall be granted clearance papers for his vessel until he has deposited such list or lists with the immigration officials at the port of departure and made oath that they are full and complete as to the name and other information herein required concerning each person of the classes specified taken on board his vessel; and any neglect or omission to comply with the requirements of this section shall be punishable as provided in section 14 of this act: Provided, That in the case of vessels making regular trips to ports of the United States the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, may, when expedient, arrange for the delivery of such lists of outgoing aliens at a later date: Provided further, That it shall be the duty of immigration officials to record the following information regarding every resident alien and citizen leaving the United States by way of the Canadian or Mexican borders for permanent residence in a foreign country: Name, age, and sex; whether married or single; calling or occupation; whether able to read; nationality; country of birth; country of which citizen or subject; race; last permanent residence in the United States; intended future permanent residence; and time and port of last arrival in the United States; and if a United States citizen, whether native born or naturalized.

"SEC. 13. That all aliens arriving by water at the ports of the United States shall be listed in convenient groups, the names of those coming from the same locality to be assembled so far as practicable, and no one list or manifest shall contain more than 30 names. To each alien or head of a family shall be given a ticket on which shall be written his name, a number or letter designating the list in which his name, etc., is contained, and his number on said list, for convenience of identification on arrival. Each list or manifest shall be verified by the signature and the oath or affirmation of the master or commanding officer, or the first or second below him in command, taken before an immigration officer at the port of arrival, to the effect that he has caused the surgeon of said vessel sailing therewith to make a physical and oral examination of each of said aliens, and that from the report of said surgeon and from his own investigation he believes that no one of said aliens is of any of the classes excluded from admission into the United States by section 3 of this act, and that also according to the best of his knowledge and belief, the information in said lists or manifests concerning each of said aliens named therein is correct and true in every respect. That the surgeon of said vessel sailing therewith shall also sign each of said lists or manifests and make oath or affirmation in like manner before an immigration officer at the port of arrival, stating his professional experience and qualifications as a physician and surgeon, and that he has made a personal examination of each of the said aliens named therein, and that the said list or manifest, according to the best of his knowledge and belief, is full, correct, and true in all particulars relative to the mental and physical condition of said aliens. If no surgeon sails with any vessel bringing aliens the mental and physical examinations and the verifications of the lists or manifests shall be made by some competent surgeon employed by the owners of the said vessels, and the manifests shall be verified by such surgeon before a United States consular officer.

"SEC. 14. That it shall be unlawful for the master or commanding officer of any vessel bringing aliens into or carrying aliens out of the United States to refuse or fail to deliver to the immigration officials the accurate and full manifests or statements or information regarding all aliens on board or taken on board such vessel required by this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that there has been such a refusal or failure, or that the lists delivered are not accurate and full, such master or commanding officer shall pay to the collector of customs at the port of arrival or departure the sum of $10 for each alien concerning whom such accurate and full manifest or statement or information is not furnished, or concerning whom the manifest or statement or information is not prepared and sworn to as prescribed by this act. No vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while it remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit with the collector of customs of a sum sufficient to cover such fine.

"SEC. 15. That upon the arrival at a port of the United States of any vessel bringing aliens it shall be the duty of the proper immigration officials to go or to send competent assistants to the vessel and there inspect all such aliens, or said immigration officials may order a temporary removal of such aliens for examination at a designated time and place, but such temporary removal shall not be considered a landing, nor shall it relieve the transportation lines, masters, agents, owners, or consignees of the vessel upon which said aliens are brought to any port of the United States from any of the obligations which, in case such aliens remain on board, would, under the provisions of this act bind the said transportation lines, masters, agents, owners, or consignees: Provided, That where removal is made to premises owned or controlled by the United States, said transportation lines, masters, agents, owners, or consignees, and each of them shall, so long as detention there lasts, be relieved of responsibility for the safekeeping of such aliens. Whenever a temporary removal of aliens is made the transportation lines which brought them and the masters, owners, agents, and consignees of the vessel upon which they arrive shall pay all expenses of such removal and all expenses arising during subsequent detention, pending decision on the aliens' eligibility to enter the United States and until they are either allowed to land or returned to the care of the line or to the vessel which brought them, such expenses to include those of maintenance, medical treatment in hospital or elsewhere, burial in the event of death, and transfer to the vessel in the event of deportation, excepting only where they arise under the terms of any of the provisos of section 18 thereof. Any refusal or failure to comply with the provisions hereof to be punished in the manner specified in section 18 of this act.

"SEC. 16. That the physical and mental examination of all arriving aliens shall be made by medical officers of the United States Public Health Service, who shall have had at least two years' experience in the practice of their profession since receiving the degree of doctor of medicine, and who shall certify, for the information of the immigration officers and the boards of special inquiry hereinafter provided for, any and all physical and mental defects or diseases observed by said medical officers in any such alien; or, should medical officers of the United States Public Health Service be not available, civil surgeons of not less than four years' professional experience may be employed in such emergency for such service, upon such terms as may be prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. Medical officers of the United States Public Health Service who have had especial training in the diagnosis of insanity and mental defect shall be detailed for duty or employed at all large ports of entry, and such medical officers shall be provided with suitable facilities for the detention and examination of all arriving aliens in whom insanity or mental defect is suspected, and the services of interpreters shall be provided for such examination. That the inspection, other than the physical and mental examination, of aliens, including those seeking admission or readmission to or the privilege of passing through or residing in the United States, and the examination of aliens arrested within the United States under this act, shall be conducted by immigrant inspectors, except as hereinafter provided in regard to boards of special inquiry. Immigrant inspectors are hereby authorized and empowered to board and search for aliens any vessel, railway car, conveyance, or vehicle in which they believe aliens are being brought into the United States. Said inspectors shall have power to administer oaths and to take and consider evidence touching the right of any alien to enter, reenter, pass through, or reside in the United States, and, where such action may be necessary, to make a written record of such evidence; and any person to whom such an oath has been administered, under the provisions of this act, who shall knowingly or willfully give false evidence or swear to any false statement in any way affecting or in relation to the right of any alien to admission, or readmission to, or to pass through, or to reside in the United States shall be deemed guilty of perjury and be punished as provided by section 125 of the act approved March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States." Any commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge shall also have power to require the attendance and testimony of witnesses before said inspectors and the production of books, papers, and documents touching the right of any alien to enter, reenter, reside in, or pass through the United States, and to that end may invoke the aid of any court of the United States; and any district court within the jurisdiction of which investigations are being conducted by an immigrant inspector may, in the event of neglect or refusal to respond to a subpœna issued by any commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge, or refusal to testify before said immigrant inspector, issue an order requiring such person to appear before said immigrant inspector, produce books, papers, and documents if demanded, and testify; and any failure to obey such order of the court shall be punished by the court as a contempt thereof. That any person, including employees, officials, or agents of transportation companies, who shall assault, resist, prevent, impede, or interfere with any immigration official or employee in the performance of his duty under this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not less than six months nor more than two years, or by a fine of not less than two hundred nor more than two thousand dollars; and any person who shall use any deadly or dangerous weapon in resisting any immigration official or employee in the performance of his duty shall be deemed guilty of a felony and shall on conviction thereof be punished by imprisonment for not less than 1 nor more than 10 years. Every alien who may not appear to the examining immigrant inspector at the port of arrival to be clearly and beyond doubt entitled to land shall be detained for examination in relation thereto by a board of special inquiry. In the event of rejection by the board of special inquiry, in all cases where an appeal to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is permitted by this act, the alien shall be so informed and shall have the right to be represented by counsel or other advisor on such appeal. The decision of an immigrant inspector, if favorable to the admission of any alien, shall be subject to challenge by any other immigrant inspector, and such challenge shall operate to take the alien whose right to land is so challenged before a board of special inquiry for its investigation.

"SEC. 17. That boards of special inquiry shall be appointed by the commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge at the various ports of arrival as may be necessary for the prompt determination of all cases of immigrants detained at such ports under the provisions of the law. Each board shall consist of three members, who shall be selected from such of the immigrant officials in the service as the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, shall from time to time designate as qualified to serve on such boards. When in the opinion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the maintenance of a permanent board of special inquiry for service at any sea or land border port is not warranted, regularly constituted boards may be detailed from other stations for temporary service at such port, or, if that be impracticable, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall authorize the creation of boards of special inquiry by the immigration officials in charge at such ports, and shall determine what Government officials or other persons shall be eligible for service on such boards. Such boards shall have authority to determine whether an alien who has been duly held shall be allowed to land or shall be deported. All hearings before such boards shall be separate and apart from the public. Such boards shall keep a complete permanent record of their proceedings and of all such testimony as may be produced before them; and the decision of any two members of a board shall prevail, but either the alien or any dissenting member of the said board may appeal through the commissioner of immigration at the port of arrival and the Commissioner General of Immigration to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and the taking of such appeal shall operate to stay any action in regard to the final disposal of any alien whose case is so appealed until the receipt by the commissioner of immigration at the port of arrival of such decision, which shall be rendered solely upon the evidence adduced before the board of special inquiry. In every case where an alien is excluded from admission into the United States, under any law or treaty now existing or hereafter made, the decision of a board of special inquiry if adverse to the admission of such alien shall be final, unless reversed on appeal to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor: Provided, That the decision of a board of special inquiry, based upon the certificate of the examining medical officer, shall be final as to the rejection of aliens affected with tuberculosis in any form or with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, or with any mental or physical disability which would bring such aliens within any of the classes excluded from admission to the United States under section 3 of this act.

"SEC. 18. That all aliens brought to this country in violation of law shall, if practicable, be immediately sent back, in accommodations of the same class in which they arrived, to the country whence they respectively came, on the vessels bringing them. The cost of their maintenance while on land, as well as the expense of the return of such aliens, shall be borne by the owner or owners of the vessels on which they respectively came. That it shall be unlawful for any master, purser, person in charge, agent, owner, or consignee of any such vessel to refuse to receive back on board thereof, or on board of any other vessel owned or operated by the same interests, such aliens; or to fail to detain them thereon; or to refuse or fail to return them in the manner aforesaid to the foreign port from which they came; or to pay the cost of their maintenance while on land; or to make any charge for the return of any such alien; or to take any security from him for the payment of such charge; or to take any consideration to be returned in case the alien is landed; or knowingly to bring to the United States at any time within one year from the date of deportation any alien rejected or arrested and deported under any provision of this act, unless prior to reembarkation the Secretary of Commerce and Labor has consented that such alien shall reapply for admission, as required by section 3 hereof; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that such master, purser, person in charge, agent, owner, or consignee has violated any of the foregoing provisions such master, purser, person in charge, agent, owner, or consignee shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located, or in which any vessel of the line may be found, the sum of $300 for each and every violation of any provision of this section; and no vessel shall have clearance from any port of the United States while any such fine is unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit with the collector of customs of a sum sufficient to cover such fine. If the vessel by which any alien ordered deported came has left the United States and it is impracticable for any reason to deport the alien within a reasonable time by another vessel owned by the same interests, the cost of deportation may be paid by the Government and recovered by civil suit from any agent, owner, or consignee of the vessel: Provided further, That the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, may suspend, upon conditions to be prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, the deportation of any alien found to have come in violation of any provision of this act if, in his judgment, the testimony of such alien is necessary on behalf of the United States Government in the prosecution of offenders against any provision of this act; and the cost of maintenance of any person so detained resulting from such suspension of deportation, and a witness fee in the sum of $1 per day for each day such person is so detained, may be paid from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, or such alien may be released under bond, in the penalty of not less than $500, with security approved by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, conditioned that such alien shall be produced when required as a witness and for deportation. No alien certified, as provided in section 16 of this act, to be suffering from tuberculosis in any form, or from a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease other than one of quarantinable nature, shall be permitted to land for medical treatment thereof in any hospital in the United States, unless with the express permission of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor: Provided further, That upon the certificate of a medical officer of the United States Public Health Service to the effect that the health or safety of an insane alien would be unduly imperiled by immediate deportation, such alien may, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, be held for treatment until such time as such alien may, in the opinion of such medical officer, be safely deported: Provided further, That upon the certificate of a medical officer of the United States Public Health Service to the effect that a rejected alien is helpless from sickness, mental or physical disability, or infancy, if such alien is accompanied by another alien whose protection or guardianship is required by such rejected alien, such accompanying alien may also be excluded, and the master, agent, owner, or consignee of the vessel in which such alien and accompanying alien are brought shall be required to return said alien and accompanying alien in the same manner as vessels are required to return other rejected aliens.

"SEC. 19. That any alien, at any time within three years after entry, who shall enter the United States in violation of law; any alien who within three years after entry becomes a public charge from causes existing prior to the landing; except as hereinafter provided, any alien who is hereafter sentenced to imprisonment for a term of one year or more because of conviction in this country of a crime involving moral turpitude, committed within three years after the entry of the alien to the United States; any alien who shall be found an inmate of or connected with the management of a house of prostitution or practicing prostitution after such alien shall have entered the United States, or who shall receive, share in, or derive benefit from any part of the earnings of any prostitute; any alien who is employed by, in, or in connection with any house of prostitution or music or dance hall or other place of amusement or resort habitually frequented by prostitutes, or where prostitutes gather, or who in any way assists, protects, or promises to protect from arrest any prostitute; any alien who shall import or attempt to import any person for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; any alien who, after being excluded and deported or arrested and deported as a prostitute, or as a procurer, or as having been connected with the business of prostitution or importation for prostitution or other immoral purposes in any of the ways hereinbefore specified, shall return to and enter the United States; any alien convicted and imprisoned for a violation of any of the provisions of section 4 hereof; any alien, at any time within three years after entry, who shall enter the United States by water at any time or place other than as designated by immigration officials, or by land at any place other than one designated as a port of entry for aliens by the Commissioner General of Immigration, or at any time not designated by immigration officials, shall, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, be taken into custody and deported: Provided, That the provision of this section respecting the deportation of aliens convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude shall not apply to one who has been pardoned, nor shall such deportation be made or directed if the court sentencing such alien for such crime shall, at the time of imposing judgment or passing sentence, make a recommendation to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that such alien shall not be deported in pursuance of this act; nor shall any alien convicted as aforesaid be deported until after the termination of his imprisonment: Provided further, That the provisions of this section, with the exceptions hereinbefore noted, shall be applicable to the classes of aliens therein mentioned irrespective of the time of their entry into the United States. In every case where any person is ordered deported from the United States under the provisions of this act or of any law or treaty now existing, the decision of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall be final.

"SEC. 20. That the deportation of aliens provided for in this act shall, at the option of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, be to the country whence they came or to the foreign port at which such aliens embarked for the United States; or, if such embarkation was for foreign contiguous territory, to the foreign port at which they embarked for such territory; or, if such aliens entered foreign contiguous territory from the United States and later entered the United States, or if such aliens are held by the country from which they entered the United States not to be subjects or citizens of such country, and such country refuses to permit their reentry, or imposes any condition upon permitting reentry, then to the country of which such aliens are subjects or citizens, or to the country in which they resided prior to entering the country from which they entered the United States. If effected at any time within five years after the entry of the alien, such deportation, including one-half of the entire cost of removal to the port of deportation, shall be at the expense of the contractor, procurer, or other person by whom the alien was unlawfully induced to enter the United States, or, if that can not be done, then the cost of removal to the port of deportation shall be at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, and the deportation from such port shall be at the expense of the owner or owners of such vessels or transportation line by which such aliens respectively came, or, if that is not practicable, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. If such deportation is effected later than five years after the entry of the alien, or, if the deportation is made by reason of causes arising subsequent to entry, the cost thereof shall be payable from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. A failure or refusal on the part of the masters, agents, owners, or consignees of vessels to comply with the order of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to take on board, guard safely, and transport to the destination specified any alien ordered to be deported under the provisions of this act shall be punished by the imposition of the penalties prescribed in section 18 of this act: Provided, That when in the opinion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the mental or physical condition of such alien is such as to require personal care and attendance, he may employ a suitable person for that purpose, who shall accompany such alien to his or her final destination, and the expense incident to such service shall be defrayed in like manner. Pending the final disposal of the case of any alien so taken into custody he may be released under a bond in the penalty of not less than $500 with security approved by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, conditioned that such alien shall be produced when required for a hearing or hearings in regard to the charge upon which he has been taken into custody, and for deportation if he shall be found to be unlawfully within the United States.

"SEC. 21. That any alien liable to be excluded because likely to become a public charge or because of physical disability other than tuberculosis in any form or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease may, if otherwise admissible, nevertheless be admitted in the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor upon the giving of a suitable and proper bond or undertaking, approved by said Secretary, in such amount and containing such conditions as he may prescribe, to the United States and to all States, Territories, counties, towns, municipalities, and districts thereof, holding the United States and all States, Territories, counties, towns, municipalities, and districts thereof harmless against such alien becoming a public charge. The admission of such alien shall be a consideration for the giving of such bond or undertaking. Suit may be brought thereon in the name and by the proper law officers either of the United States Government or of any State, Territory, district, county, town, or municipality in which such alien becomes a public charge.

"SEC. 22. That wherever an alien shall have taken up his permanent residence in this country, and shall have filed his declaration of intention to become a citizen, and thereafter shall send for his wife or minor children to join him, if said wife or any of said children shall be found to be affected with any contagious disorder, such wife or children shall be held, under such regulations as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall prescribe, until it shall be determined whether the disorder will be easily curable or whether they can be permitted to land without any danger to other persons; and they shall not be either admitted or deported until such facts have been ascertained; and if it shall be determined that the disorder is easily curable and the husband or father or other responsible person is willing to bear the expense of the treatment, they may be accorded treatment in hospital until cured and then be admitted, or if it shall be determined that they can be permitted to land without danger to other persons, they may, if otherwise admissible, thereupon be admitted.

"SEC. 23. That the Commissioner General of Immigration shall perform all his duties under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. Under such direction he shall have charge of the administration of all laws relating to the immigration of aliens into the United States, and shall have the control, direction, and supervision of all officers, clerks, and employees appointed thereunder; he shall establish such rules and regulations, prescribe such forms of bond, reports, entries, and other papers, and shall issue from time to time such instructions, not inconsistent with law, as he shall deem best calculated for carrying out the provisions of this act and for protecting the United States and aliens migrating thereto from fraud and loss, and shall have authority to enter into contract for the support and relief of such aliens as may fall into distress or need public aid, and to remove to their native country, at any time within three years after entry, at the expense of the appropriations for the enforcement of this act, such as fall into distress or need public aid from causes arising subsequent to their entry and are desirous of being so removed; he shall prescribe rules for the entry and inspection of aliens along the borders of Canada and Mexico, so as not to unnecessarily delay, impede, or annoy persons in ordinary travel between the United States and said countries, and shall have power to enter into contracts with transportation lines for the said purpose; it shall be the duty of the Commissioner General of Immigration to detail officers of the Immigration Service from time to time as may be necessary, in his judgment, to secure information as to the number of aliens detained in the penal, reformatory, and charitable institutions (public and private) of the several States and Territories, the District of Columbia, and other territory of the United States and to inform the officers of such institutions of the provisions of law in relation to the deportation of aliens who have become public charges. He may, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, whenever in his judgment such action may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act, detail immigration officers, and also surgeons of the United States Public Health Service employed under this act for service in foreign countries. The duties of commissioners of immigration and other immigration officials in charge of districts, ports, or stations shall be of an administrative character, to be prescribed in detail by regulations prepared under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor: Provided, That for the purpose of making effective the provisions of this section relating to the protection of aliens from fraud and loss, and also the provisions of section 30 of this act, relating to the distribution of aliens, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall establish and maintain immigrant stations at such interior places as may be necessary, and, in the discretion of the said Secretary, aliens in transit from ports of landing to such interior stations shall be accompanied by immigrant inspectors.

"SEC. 24. That immigrant inspectors and other immigration officers, clerks, and employees shall hereafter be appointed and their compensation fixed and raised or decreased from time to time by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, upon the recommendation of the Commissioner General of Immigration and in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service act of January 16, 1883: Provided, That said Secretary, in the enforcement of that portion of this act which excludes contract laborers, may employ, without reference to the provisions of the said civil-service act, or to the various acts relative to the compilation of the official register, such persons as he may deem advisable and from time to time fix, raise, or decrease their compensation. He may draw annually from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act $50,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended for the salaries and expenses of persons so employed and for expenses incident to such employment; and the accounting officers of the Treasury shall pass to the credit of the proper disbursing officer expenditures from said sum without itemized account whenever the Secretary of Commerce and Labor certifies that an itemized account would not be for the best interests of the Government: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to alter the mode of appointing commissioners of immigration at the several ports of the United States as provided by the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 18, 1894, or the official status of such commissioners heretofore appointed.

"SEC. 25. That the district courts of the United States are hereby invested with full and concurrent jurisdiction of all causes, civil and criminal, arising under any of the provisions of this act. That it shall be the duty of the United States district attorney of the proper district to prosecute every such writ when brought by the United States under this act. Such prosecutions or suits may be instituted at any place in the United States at which the violation may occur or at which the person charged with such violation may be found. That no suit or proceeding for a violation of the provisions of this act shall be settled, compromised, or discontinued without the consent of the court in which it is pending, entered of record, with the reasons therefor.

"SEC. 26. That all exclusive privileges of exchanging money, transporting passengers or baggage, or keeping eating houses, and all other like privileges in connection with any United States immigrant station, shall be disposed of after public competition, subject to such conditions and limitations as the Commissioner General of Immigration, under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, may prescribe, and all receipts accruing from the disposal of such exclusive privileges shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States. No intoxicating liquors shall be sold at any such immigrant station.

"SEC. 27. That for the preservation of the peace and in order that arrests may be made for crimes under the laws of the States and Territories of the United States where the various immigrant stations are located, the officers in charge of such stations, as occasion may require, shall admit therein the proper State and municipal officers charged with the enforcement of such laws, and for the purpose of this section the jurisdiction of such officers and of the local courts shall extend over such stations.

"SEC. 28. That any person who knowingly aids or assists any anarchist or any person who believes in or advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or who disbelieves in or is opposed to organized government, or all forms of law, or who advocates the assassination of public officials, or who is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or who advocates or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, to enter the United States, or who connives or conspires with any person or persons to allow, procure, or permit any such anarchist or person aforesaid to enter therein shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

"SEC. 29. That the President of the United States is authorized, in the name of the Government of the United States, to call, in his discretion, an international conference, to assemble at such point as may be agreed upon, or to send special commissioners to any foreign country, for the purpose of regulating by international agreement, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, the immigration of aliens to the United States; of providing for the mental, moral, and physical examination of such aliens by American consuls or other officers of the United States Government at the ports of embarkation, or elsewhere; of securing the assistance of foreign Governments in their own territories to prevent the evasion of the laws of the United States governing immigration to the United States; of entering into such international agreements as may be proper to prevent the immigration of aliens who, under the laws of the United States, are or may be excluded from entering the United States, and of regulating any matters pertaining to such immigration.

"SEC. 30. That there shall be maintained a division of information in the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization; and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall provide such clerical and other assistance as may be necessary. It shall be the duty of said division to promote a beneficial distribution of aliens admitted into the United States among the several States and Territories desiring immigration. Correspondence shall be had with the proper officials of the States and Territories, and said division shall gather from all available sources useful information regarding the resources, products, and physical characteristics of each State and Territory, and shall publish such information in different languages and distribute the publications among all admitted aliens at the immigrant stations of the United States and to such other persons as may desire the same. When any State or Territory appoints and maintains an agent or agents to represent it at any of the immigrant stations of the United States, such agents shall, under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, have access to aliens who have been admitted to the United States for the purpose of presenting, either orally or in writing, the special inducements offered by such State or Territory to aliens to settle therein. While on duty at any immigrant station such agents shall be subject to all the regulations prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, who, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, may, for violation of any such regulations, deny to the agent guilty of such violation any of the privileges herein granted.

"SEC. 31. That any person, including the owner, agent, consignee, or master of any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place, who shall knowingly sign on the ship's articles, or bring to the United States as one of the crew of such vessel, any alien, with intent to permit such alien to land in the United States in violation of the laws and treaties of the United States regulating the immigration of aliens, or who shall falsely and knowingly represent to the immigration authorities at the port of arrival that any such alien is a bona fide member of the crew, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding $5,000, for which sum the said vessel shall be liable and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense.

"SEC. 32. That no alien excluded from admission into the United States by any law or treaty of the United States regulating the immigration of aliens, and employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place, shall be permitted to land in the United States, except temporarily for medical treatment, or pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor providing for the ultimate removal or deportation of such alien from the United States, and the negligent failure of the owner, agent, consignee, or master of such vessel to detain on board any such alien after notice in writing by the immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival, and to deport such alien, if required by such immigration officer or by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, shall render such owner, agent, consignee, or master liable to a penalty not exceeding $1,000, for which sum the said vessel shall be liable, and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense.

"SEC. 33. That it shall be unlawful and be deemed a violation of the preceding section to pay off or discharge any alien employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place, unless duly admitted pursuant to the laws and treaties of the United States regulating the immigration of aliens: Provided, That in case any such alien intends to reship on board any other vessel bound to any foreign port or place he shall be allowed to land for the purpose of so reshipping, and may be paid off, discharged, and permitted to remove his effects, anything in such laws or treaties or in this act to the contrary notwithstanding, provided due notice of such proposed action first be given to the principal immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival.

"SEC. 34. That any alien seaman who shall desert his vessel in a port of the United States or who shall land therein contrary to the provisions of this act shall be deemed to be unlawfully in the United States, and shall, at any time within three years thereafter, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, be taken into custody and brought before a board of special inquiry for examination as to his qualifications for admission to the United States, and if not admitted said alien seaman shall be deported at the expense of the appropriation for this act as provided in section 20 of this act.

"SEC. 35. That it shall be unlawful for any vessel carrying passengers between a port of the United States and a port of a foreign country, upon arrival in the United States, to have on board employed thereon any alien afflicted with idiocy, imbecility, insanity, epilepsy, tuberculosis in any form, or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, if it appears to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, from an examination made by a medical officer of the United States Public Health Service, and is so certified by such officer, that any such alien was so afflicted at the time he was shipped or engaged and taken on board such vessel and that the existence of such affliction might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time; and for every such alien so afflicted on board any such vessel at the time of arrival the owner, agent, consignee, or master thereof shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $25; and no vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine and while it remains unpaid: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine: Provided further, That such fine may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, be mitigated or remitted.

"SEC. 36. That upon arrival of any vessel in the United States from any foreign port or place it shall be the duty of the owner, agent, consignee, or master thereof to deliver to the principal immigration officer in charge of the port of arrival lists containing the names of all aliens employed on such vessel, stating the positions they respectively hold in the ship's company, when and where they were respectively shipped or engaged, and specifying those to be paid off and discharged in the port of arrival; or lists containing so much of such information as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall by regulation prescribe; and after the arrival of any such vessel it shall be the duty of such owner, agent, consignee, or master to report to such immigration officer, in writing, as soon as discovered, all cases in which any such alien has deserted the vessel, giving a description of such alien, together with any information likely to lead to his apprehension; and before the departure of any such vessel it shall be the duty of such owner, agent, consignee, or master to deliver to such immigration officer a further list containing the names of all alien employees who were not employed thereon at the time of the arrival, but who will leave port thereon at the time of her departure, and also the names of those, if any, who have been paid off and discharged, and of those, if any, who have deserted or landed or been duly admitted; and in case of the failure of such owner, agent, consignee, or master so to deliver either of the said lists of such aliens arriving and departing, respectively, or so to report such cases of desertion, or landing, such owner, agent, consignee, or master shall, if required by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $10 for each alien concerning whom correct lists are not delivered or a true report is not made as above required; and no such vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine and, in the event such fine is imposed, while it remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine.

"SEC. 37. The word 'person' as used in this act shall be construed to import both the plural and the singular, as the case may be, and shall include corporations, companies, and associations. When construing and enforcing the provisions of this act, the act, omission, or failure of any director, officer, agent, or employee of any corporation, company, or association acting within the scope of his employment or office shall in every case be deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such corporation, company, or association, as well as that of the person acting for or in behalf of such corporation, company, or association.

"SEC. 38. That this act, except as otherwise provided in section 3, shall take effect and be enforced from and after July 1, 1913. The act of March 26, 1910, amending the act of February 20, 1907, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States; the act of February 20, 1907, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, except section 34 thereof; the act of March 3, 1903, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, except section 34 thereof; and all other acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed on and after the taking effect of this act: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to repeal, alter, or amend existing laws relating to the immigration or exclusion of Chinese persons or persons of Chinese descent, nor to repeal, alter, or amend section 6, chapter 453, third session, Fifty-eighth Congress, approved February 6, 1905, or the act approved August 2, 1882, entitled 'An act to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea,' and amendments thereto: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to affect any prosecution, suit, action, or proceedings brought, or any act, thing, or matter, civil or criminal, done or existing at the time of the taking effect of this act, except as mentioned in the last proviso of section 19 hereof; but as to all such prosecutions, suits, actions, proceedings, acts, things, or matters, the laws or parts of laws repealed or amended by this act are hereby continued in force and effect."

H. C. LODGE,
WM. P. DILLINGHAM,
LE ROY PERCY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOHN L. BURNETT,
AUGUSTUS P. GARDNER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I regret very much to say that after the conference report had been agreed to in the other House it was found that a change which had been made in one of the Senate provisions had been put in the wrong place. The conference committee desired to mitigate or relax, if they could, the law in regard to aliens who had taken out their first papers declaring their intention to become citizens of the United States. In doing that a provision was placed at the beginning of the bill, where it would have the effect, as was found on examination, of nullifying the deportation clause in case of the white-slave traffic and also in cases of disease or crime. It therefore becomes absolutely necessary to transpose the clause to the proper place. It is with regret that I do so, Mr. President, but the error is such that it is absolutely necessary to take back the conference report, so that the error may be corrected. I therefore move that the Senate further insist on its disagreement to the amendment and ask for a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. LODGE, Mr. DILLINGHAM, and Mr. PERCY conferees on the part of the Senate.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 7160) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. BURNHAM, and Mr. GORE conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 8034) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. BURNHAM, and Mr. GORE conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 8035) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. BURNHAM, and Mr. GORE conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following House bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

H. R. 3967. An act granting an increase of pension to John R. Fugill;

H. R. 27806. An act granting a pension to Mary MacArthur;

H. R. 27874. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 28282. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 28379. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia obtained the floor.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SANDERS. It is for a matter which I think will cause no debate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. SANDERS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 8273) authorizing the Secretary of War to make certain donations of condemned cannon and cannon balls.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CATRON. I move to amend the bill by inserting——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will first ask is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. I object. I desire to have the bill go over until to-morrow for an amendment.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, I might state for the information of Senators that this is a kind of omnibus bill, covering various other bills on this subject that have been introduced, and I shall therefore feel at liberty to accept any amendment which may be suggested by the Senator from North Dakota, if he wishes to offer one on a similar line.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think there was a bill on the subject introduced last summer. I will ask the Senator if he will not allow the bill to go over until to-morrow, so that I can look into it and see what amendment I desire to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over on the objection of the Senator from North Dakota.

AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 22871, known as the agricultural extension department bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 22871) to establish agricultural extension departments in connection with agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to offer two amendments to the original bill. I send them to the desk and ask that they be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 2, page 2, line 10, it is proposed to insert "and the farm management and farm practice work of the Bureau of Plant Industry of the Department of Agriculture."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to state, Mr. President, that that is the amendment perfected by the Senator from Ohio. Representatives of the department who presented it to him have added a few more words to it. It is in the language submitted by them, with the signatures of the gentlemen who had it under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The second amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 8 it is proposed to insert the following:

The provisions of this act are hereby extended to the Territories, namely, to Hawaii, Alaska, and Porto Rico: Provided, however, That no distribution of funds shall be made to the agricultural colleges of such Territories until the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine that such colleges are prepared to avail themselves of the same.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish simply to say, Mr. President, that that amendment was also prepared in deference to the request of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] and other Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator whether the amendment refers to Porto Rico as a Territory?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; Porto Rico is referred to as a Territory.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that is not technically correct.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I know that; and for that reason, while referring to them as Territories, the amendment names the three, because just exactly what they are I do not know.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I shall object to that, because I think it is rather deplorable to incorporate into the law a designation of this sort which is incorrect. Hawaii is a Territory, and I suppose Alaska is or is to become one; but I suggest that, in place of using the term "Territory" in connection with Porto Rico, we insert the words "and the District of Porto Rico" or "Porto Rico," so as to make a distinction.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would the Senator also say "the District of Alaska"?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the language is not so objectionable with regard to Alaska.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was informed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that the Supreme Court had decided in a certain case before the court not very long ago that Alaska is a Territory.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We might avoid trouble by simply retaining the three names without designating them as Territories or otherwise.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that would be desirable.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not opposed to the amendment at all, but I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand, the pending question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE]. Is it in order now to amend the original proposition until the substitute is perfected?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that it is in order to first perfect the original bill and then the substitute will be presented.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Chair is right. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Vermont that he make the same modifications in his substitute that have been made in the original bill, so that it will be taken care of in either event.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia modifies his amendment. The amendment as modified will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 8 it is proposed to add the following:

The provisions of this act are hereby extended to Hawaii, Alaska, and Porto Rico: Provided, however, That no distribution of funds shall be made to the agricultural colleges of Hawaii, Alaska, and Porto Rico until the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine that such colleges are prepared to avail themselves of the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now upon the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, for the purpose of perfecting the bill I offer an amendment to come in on page 3, line 20. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 20, after the word "Treasury," it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided further, That no State shall pay out any part of the appropriation provided in this act to any agricultural college until the governor of said State and the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States shall jointly approve the questions or departments of study that are being or are proposed to be offered in said college or colleges.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I made an inquiry about the necessity for this amendment when last we had the matter before us. The inquiry was assumed to be answered by reading sections of the bill, but I do not think there is anything in the bill which renders unnecessary the proposition contained in this amendment. Section 7, on page 6 of the original bill of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], provides:

SEC. 7. That for the support in each State college of agriculture and the mechanic arts of an extension department or division the sum of $640,000 annually, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, of which annual appropriation $10,000 shall be allotted to each of the 48 States for the benefit of such extension departments.

The object of this amendment is to insure that this appropriation of $640,000 annually shall be given to those colleges which the governor of the State and the Secretary of Agriculture jointly shall hold are colleges whose principal purpose is instruction in agriculture, and that this is the prime purpose of the colleges. We have agricultural colleges in our States that we are unable to differentiate from any other college, except that they give some little instruction in agriculture. The course ought to be such that we would be able to differentiate the agricultural college from the ordinary State university or college. Certainly no harm can come from requiring that this sum shall be paid only when the course taught in agriculture shall be such as shall be approved by the governor of the State and by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be again read.

The Secretary again read the proposed amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will not pass. Our agricultural colleges have been organized for years. The large majority of them are doing splendid work. The report of the Secretary of Agriculture shows that they receive from the States and from other sources several times as much as they receive from the National Government. At this late day, to make the departure that is proposed, that the Secretary of Agriculture shall have the right to fix the courses of study in the State colleges of agriculture, I think would be a great mistake.

I wish I could feel sure that the Government would permanently have in the office of Secretary of Agriculture a man who is the equal of the average president of the State colleges of agriculture. I do not believe there is a stronger body of men engaged in public service, certainly not in educational service, than the presidents and faculties of our colleges of agriculture. This amendment subjects their entire course of study to the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture——

Mr. TILLMAN. Whoever he may be.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Whoever he may be—good or bad. I think it would be a great mistake.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the Senator did not listen carefully to the reading of the amendment or he would realize that he is in error in the statement that this matter is to be determined exclusively by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It says "the governor of said State and the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. McCUMBER. It is to be determined by the governor of the State and the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But suppose they disagree? Then it has not been approved by both.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not imagine that the Secretary of Agriculture, whose sole function is to look after the agricultural interests of the country, would disagree with the governor of the State, unless that disagreement were based upon the belief that the agricultural course was insufficient, and that in reality the funds were being used for other purposes.

The only object of this amendment is that we may know definitely what is the scope and purpose of the appropriation—that it is for agricultural purposes, and that it should be limited to agricultural purposes. The States are now appropriating enough for their State universities for general education; and if we are to appropriate the millions of dollars that are provided in this bill for agricultural purposes, there ought to be some authority to determine whether or not an institution is complying with what Congress itself intends shall be complied with in the matter of the extension of this agricultural work.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand perfectly the object of the amendment, and I sympathize, in part, with it. I am thoroughly in favor of making these agricultural colleges genuine agriculture colleges. So far as my own State is concerned, there could be no possible embarrassment from the adoption of this measure in its practical operation, because I am glad to say that our agriculture college is distinctively an agricultural college and is subject to none of the criticisms that were evidently in the minds of those who drew the original amendment which the Senator from North Dakota presented on Friday. But I do not believe a Secretary of Agriculture ought to be given the power of passing on the courses of study in all the agricultural colleges of the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator who should have the power of determining that question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the authorities of the State can properly determine it. I can not doubt but that there is an influence in the States for agricultural education that can be trusted. There are many whose opinions I would rather have than that of the average man who might be Secretary of Agriculture. I would rather have the opinion of the president of the Wisconsin College of Agriculture or the president of the Iowa College of Agriculture or the president of the Illinois College of Agriculture, or half a dozen more whom I might mention, than the opinions of the men I am sure would fill the office of Secretary of Agriculture. I do not think we could ask at this late time——

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me finish my sentence, and then I will yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. At the end of 50 years of operation of our agricultural colleges, I do not think we should now undertake to remove from the present authorities their power to handle this matter.

Now, I will answer the Senator's question.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is considerable complaint in several of our States—there is complaint in my own State from some quarters—that the agricultural college is duplicating, to some extent, the work of the State university. I do not know to what extent that is true, because I do not know the curriculum of the agricultural college. But I do believe that we should have some means of knowing the extent and the scope of agricultural education in those colleges which will be benefited by the appropriations provided. We should know what their work should be limited to. We should have that clearly defined. We should, if possible, see that those colleges shall be more and more definitely agricultural in their character, and especially that they shall not be unduly duplicating, as is now the case in some of the States, the work of the State universities.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought the Senator was asking me a question.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me just finish my sentence.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator asked me to yield for a question. I think I have the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not wish to have the money expended for duplicated work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia has the floor, and Senators desiring to interrupt him will please get permission through the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wanted the Senator to finish his question and let me answer it. I will answer now, Mr. President, not his question, but his statement.

I want to say that I cordially sympathize with the desire to prevent these colleges of agriculture from duplicating in any sense the classical work of the universities. That trouble has existed in a number of places. I am glad to say that in my own State we have completely relieved our institution of the trouble. It is rather a local question than a national question.

So far as the present appropriation goes we have included provisions that will guard the appropriation from misuse. The amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota goes not simply to this appropriation, but to the entire course of study of these agricultural colleges. It goes to the original act providing for them and the amendments thereto through which the work of the college proper is governed.

Personally, I think the laws have not been as completely enforced as they might be in that regard. I think the reports now required to be made to the Secretary of the Interior might perhaps be enlarged without giving to any particular part of the Government the exclusive privilege of passing upon the courses of study.

So far as this appropriation is concerned the bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall not certify to the Treasury the extension work appropriation unless he has examined the reports made by those managing the work to the governor of the State and sent to the Secretary of Agriculture by the governor of the State, and unless, as a result of those reports, the Secretary of Agriculture finds that the college is in good faith carrying out the purposes of this appropriation and doing the actual work which it contemplates. Otherwise the Secretary of Agriculture will not certify that particular State to the Treasury for its check. The Secretary of the Treasury will not pay the money to the State until the Secretary of Agriculture gives his certificate that the work is being done by the college as this bill requires. In case the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that the college is not doing the work required by this bill, then he shall report the fact to Congress, and unless Congress disagrees with his view and directs payment the payment will not be made.

So, if the Senator from North Dakota will observe the provisions of the bill so far as this fund is concerned, he will see that we have sought to guard the proposition fully; and I think we have guarded it, because this money must be spent in the way directed by the bill or else the Secretary of Agriculture will not give his certificate for the next year's appropriation, and the appropriation can not be had unless Congress overrules the Secretary of Agriculture.

So far as the actual study that is being done in the colleges, this bill does not touch it. It concerns the work of the experiment stations and the scientific investigations of the colleges. I do not believe the majority of the States would be willing to see the courses of study at their colleges of agriculture subject simply to the views and the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture.

I have tried to draft an amendment that might meet the requirements of the Senator and yet not be objectionable; but I am not sure that it would, and I am not really satisfied with it myself.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I join the Senator from Georgia in the hope that this amendment will not be adopted. It would be most disastrous in my own State.

In Iowa we have a State university and a distinct agricultural college. The college is properly described as a college of agriculture and the mechanic arts. The course of study there includes instruction not only in agriculture but in engineering, in home economics, and in all branches that naturally are allied with engineering and with domestic economy.

We are now engaged in a very earnest dispute with regard to the courses of study that should obtain in the agricultural college. That dispute must finally be determined by the general assembly of our State. There is no other tribunal. Speaking in part for my own State, I would be entirely unwilling to allow the governor of the State and the Secretary of Agriculture to determine whether our college should teach engineering or whether it should teach domestic economy.

I assume that no one will question, in a general way, the merit of the Iowa College of Agriculture. I think I may say without vanity that among agricultural colleges it holds a very enviable position in the country. I have no fear that any Secretary of Agriculture, or any governor, either, would ever seriously interfere with the course in agriculture. But to submit to a Secretary of Agriculture the determination of the question whether we shall teach in that college other things that are directly within the act which founded the college, or be compelled to abandon these courses of instruction at the command of either the Secretary of Agriculture or the governor, or both, would, I think, be entirely intolerable to our people, who ultimately will settle that controversy as it ought to be settled.

If this amendment were limited to the merit of the course in agriculture; that is, to determine whether or not the school really taught agriculture in a way that entitled it to recognition, that would be quite a different matter. But to submit our whole college of agriculture and mechanic arts to an officer in Washington would not meet with the approval of our people, and the result would be that we would receive no part of this additional contribution.

I therefore hope very much that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to answer the objection——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi who has addressed the Chair?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rose to obtain recognition in my own right. I thought I had risen first.

Mr. McCUMBER. I merely wish to briefly answer the objection made by the Senator from Georgia first, and then that made by the Senator from Iowa.

The bill now provides, as stated by the Senator from Georgia, that the Secretary of Agriculture must give a certificate of approval before the appropriation can be used for the next ensuing year. If the Secretary of Agriculture may give that certificate as to the continuance of an appropriation, what earthly objection could be made to the Secretary of Agriculture passing in the first instance upon what the course shall be, as to whether the appropriation shall be made?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This has nothing——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought the Senator had finished his question.

Mr. McCUMBER. It seems to me the bill is faulty if it makes an appropriation for this year in aid of the colleges, and provides that if in the ensuing year the Secretary of Agriculture finds that the appropriation has not been properly used, then the Secretary may make a certificate that the institution is not conforming to what was intended by the act and the appropriation that went with it. For my part I can not see that the action of the Secretary of Agriculture would be any more dangerous in the first instance than it would be in the second instance. If there is any justification whatever for the Secretary of Agriculture passing upon the question whether there should be a continuance of an appropriation there certainly must be equal justification for an amendment that he should pass in the first instance on whether the course is such that it should receive the appropriation.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator evidently does not understand the amendment as I do. The principal question in this case is whether the money which is appropriated shall be used exclusively for agricultural purposes. I do not believe that under this amendment anyone could construe it as intending to grant authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to discontinue or to refuse to authorize the appropriation in case civil engineering is also taught in the same institution, but what it is intended to accomplish is that the money appropriated shall not be used in such a way that it may go into the coffers of the institution to pay out instructors in teaching civil engineering or domestic economy or anything else, but that every cent of it shall be expended absolutely and unconditionally for agricultural purposes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is not the Senator from North Dakota of the opinion that the appropriation must be spent for agricultural education or demonstration? Could any part of it, under the terms of the bill as now presented, be paid out for courses of engineering or domestic economy; I mean as far as this part is concerned?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think section 7, that I read, does not leave it sufficiently clear that it shall be all expended for agricultural purposes, and that is why I offered this amendment. I would have no objection to inserting after the words "jointly approved" the word "agricultural," so as to read "jointly approve the agricultural courses, or departments, of study that are being, or are proposed to be, offered in said college or colleges."

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from North Dakota will limit it to the approval of the agricultural courses taught in the college and entirely exclude any supervision over the general work of the college my objection would disappear.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will ask leave to amend the amendment by inserting, after the words "approve the," the word "agricultural," so as to read:

Shall jointly approve the agricultural courses or departments of study that are being, or are proposed—

And so forth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota modifies his amendment. The modification will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided further, That no State shall pay out any part of the appropriation provided in this act to any agricultural college until the governor of said State and the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States shall jointly approve the agricultural courses or departments of study that are being, or are proposed to be, offered in said college or colleges.

Mr. CUMMINS. That contains the whole difficulty. The Senator does not strike out "departments of study" proposed to be pursued in the college.

Mr. McCUMBER. That means agricultural courses or agricultural departments. The word "agricultural" applies to both.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator strike out "or departments of study," and leave it simply refer to agricultural courses?

Mr. McCUMBER. So that there will be no question, I will also consent to strike out "or departments of study," as I do not know that those words add anything or detract anything.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the language as now modified.

The SECRETARY. After the word "courses" strike out the comma and the words "or departments of study," so that it will read:

Provided further, That no State shall pay out any part of the appropriation provided in this act to any agricultural college until the governor of said State and the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States shall jointly approve the agricultural courses that are being, or are proposed to be, offered in said college or colleges.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there seems to be a sort of vague impression that a man with two arms and two legs who happens to hold a position as a State official is in some way less competent to attend to the public business than a man who holds a like position as a Federal official. It seems to be taken for granted that State officials will not attend to their duties in a competent way or will not attend to them with good faith. Undoubtedly the State officials are just as good judges and are just as capable of acting bona fide in connection with the application of an appropriation like this as the Secretary of Agriculture.

This question has opened up for consideration, at any rate—and it would do the country good to consider it—a great defect in our educational system. The defect is not to be corrected by going further into the line in which we have already gone, but, if possible, by correcting some of the things that we have done. There has been too much Federal control of these institutions already. There has been too much limitation upon the rights of the State.

The truth is, Mr. President, that agriculture and the studies of all the different branches interlock themselves inextricably with the whole educational system. The truth is the appropriations ought to have been made to establish agricultural schools in the State universities, and that where there is no State university in a privately endowed university selected by the legislature of the State to act as a State university for the time being. It is abhorrent to my mind that you should send a farmer out into the world with no knowledge of anything except his specific business. If you are going to have a separate institution for agriculture and the mechanic arts, you must teach the people who go there English; you ought to teach them geography and physical, descriptive geography; you ought to teach them history. It is abhorrent to my mind that you should take it for granted that the farmer of all men should be sent ignorantly to the plow. There is no business in the world which requires more encyclopedic information than that of an up-to-date farmer.

I said a moment ago that the colleges interlock. Here is a State university that is teaching chemistry, for example. It is just grading off to teach agricultural chemistry. The State university is teaching zoology and botany. You are merely grading off when you go further and teach entomology, which is absolutely necessary to agriculture, and when you teach soil analysis, which is a chemical art in this way, and when you teach agrostology, which gives you a more peculiar and detailed knowledge of special plants that are to be raised in agriculture. So necessarily these two institutions must duplicate one another's work, and you can not help it.

The difficulty took place when you made them separate institutions. They ought to have originally been one institution. A great State university teaching civil engineering as one branch, mining engineering as a branch, electrical engineering as a branch, agriculture in all its phases is one of the greatest schools, the study of peculiar specialized branches applicable to each interlocking with the general branches that form the foundation for their use.

Nobody can understand agricultural chemistry without having gone through a course of general chemistry. Nobody can do a thing with entomology or the diseases of plants without having gone through a general course of information concerning plants themselves, botany generally. So what the Senator is seeking is something he can not obtain without repealing a course which has gone too far now to be repealed.

In my own State, I am sorry to say, instead of having one great university with an agricultural college which was interlocked with all the various cognate studies that must go to make an up-to-date farmer, a separate agricultural and mechanical college finds it necessary to teach common mathematics, of course, and history, and English. Mathematics is taught up to a tolerably high grade, not as high as it is carried at a State university or at a polytechnic institute, of course not as high as they carry it at Annapolis or West Point, but pretty high. The consequence is that we have two sets of professors receiving duplication of pay and doing the same work in two separate parts of the State.

It grew out of the insane sectional jealousies of parts of a State. People said north Iowa has a university—I just say this because I know nothing about what part of Iowa has it—but the north part of the State has a university and let us give the south part of the State the agricultural and mechanical college. So they proceed to do it, much to the detriment of the State, much to the detriment of agriculture, and much to the detriment of mankind's progress generally and the diffusion of information which is so necessary to its progress under a free government.

It is perfectly abhorrent to my mind to have the Federal Government go down to either the State university or the A. and M. College of Mississippi and attempt to dictate to the local authorities there as to what course of study they should pursue. Of course, unless they do devote the money to agricultural purposes the Secretary of the Treasury can, under this bill, refuse to give his certificate and they can not get the money. That is the string, as it seems to me, that the Federal Government ought to have upon the application of the money.

The present Secretary of Agriculture has been a blessing to America. He has been the greatest Secretary of Agriculture we have ever had and the only great one, by the way, that we have had under any administration. He has tried his best to confine himself to his work and uplift the agricultural system of the country. But, as far as my own State is concerned, I doubt if even he is as competent to judge as to what shall be taught to the farmer lads in the State of Mississippi in order to equip them for farming as they are down there. He might be more competent to judge as to what would be proper to be taught them in Iowa, because he would know just how far the common schools and graded schools and other things had diffused various branches of information amongst them.

But in order to make an agricultural college or an agricultural school in a university of much benefit you must have a very low grade of entrance examination, and that necessitates the teaching of a great many things that are somewhat remotely auxiliary to agriculture. But they are all auxiliary and they ought not to be interfered with.

I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from North Dakota offered an amendment to the bill providing that no college should receive the appropriation for the extension department in which demonstration work is to be done alongside the home of the farmer unless the course of study taught at the college has first met the approval of the governor of the State and the Secretary of Agriculture.

This bill has nothing to do with the course of study taught in the college. It is expressly for work in the interest of those who do not attend the college. It is expressly for the purpose of taking the scientific information, the established truths, from the experiment station and the college and placing them in the most practical form at the home of the farmer. What has the course of study at the college, prescribed for the students at the college, to do with taking the truths that have been demonstrated at the experiment station and the college and carrying those truths into the country to the home of the farmer?

The Senator says that the bill provides that the Secretary may withhold a certificate and thereby stop the next year's appropriation in case the money for the year previous has not been spent according to the requirements of the act, and he seemed to think he had found a happy thought when he suggested that if the Secretary can stop it for the next year why not prescribe the condition before the first money is spent? The bill prescribed the way in which the money shall be spent which the bill appropriates. It gives the details of the use as far as it could be prescribed in advance. The bill says that 75 per cent of the money must be spent in actual demonstration work on the farm; that not over 5 per cent of it shall be spent for specialization, for publication, for literature, and that the other 20 per cent may be spent in such detailed way as may be deemed advisable. Now, what would the fact that the Secretary has to pass upon the course of study in the agricultural college have to do with this work? Nothing at all.

The amendment offered by the Senator would not in any sense affect or touch the first year's work to which he refers. The Senator's amendment goes entirely to something else. The Senator's amendment reaches back into the colleges, entirely disconnected with the demonstration work, and seeks to put the hand of the Secretary of Agriculture on our State colleges of agriculture all over the United States and force them to adopt a course of study subject to the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture. I am opposed to it. I do not think the Secretary of Agriculture knows as well as the board of trustees of the State College of Iowa what kind of college they ought to have, or the board of trustees of Wisconsin, or the board of trustees of Missouri, or the board of trustees of Georgia, and I do not think the governors of States, as a rule, have known as well how to handle State colleges of agriculture as the trustees of the State colleges of agriculture. I am willing for neither the Secretary of Agriculture nor the governor to have the right to limit the course of study to what meets his approval.

The amendment proposed by the Senator does not reach this appropriation at all for its purposes. It uses this appropriation to reach somewhere else, to reach back into the course of study in the college and to hold up this appropriation which has nothing to do with the course of study in the college and to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to control the course of study in the college.

I think we are doing well with these colleges. If the Senator's own State is not doing as well, his power and influence should right the wrong and correct what is being done in North Dakota and not seek at this late day to put up any authority in Washington City to interfere with the splendid work that is being done, and not at this late day to give even the governor of a State the right to interfere with the courses of study of our agricultural colleges.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there are practically two bills in one before the Senate, and any amendment that is proposed will have to be proposed in anticipation of that kind of a completed bill which, as has been suggested, was framed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I can not get around section 7 of the proposed amendment. The Senator from Georgia says that the bill does not propose to pay anything to colleges; that it is, if I understand him——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not say that. The Senator from North Dakota misunderstood me.

Mr. McCUMBER. That it is not proposed for the support of a college, but that it is proposed for certain extension work, and for that exclusively. Granting what he says, let us read the first part of section 7, which provides:

That for the support in each State college of agriculture and the mechanic arts of an extension department or division—

It is for the support of an agricultural college in the extension department that this money is to be paid to the Agricultural Department. I do not know what that extension means. One college may have one kind of an idea of what such an extension is and another college may have an entirely distinct and different understanding of the character of work this extension service may be; but the money is to be paid "for the support in each State college of agriculture and of the mechanic arts of an extension department or division."

I certainly can see nothing that should frighten the Senator in a provision that the money so expended should absolutely be expended for the extension work, and that it should not be paid over to any college generally to swell its funds, and then allow that college alone determine to what extent it will go into the matter of extending the agricultural service. There ought to be some authority that would pass upon that subject, and the Senator's own bill provides for an authority that shall determine, in the second instance, whether the college has conformed to the requirements of law; but he seems to be bitterly opposed to the same head of a department—the Agricultural Department of the United States—having anything to do with whether the course of study in extension work is such as is contemplated in the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I only want to say a word upon this amendment. We have in the State of Wisconsin in connection with our State university one of the great agricultural colleges of the world. I think the adoption of this amendment would be tantamount to denying that agricultural college any participation in this fund. Without meaning to disparage any person, I say for the record that there never has been a governor of the State of Wisconsin, and I say that there never has been a Secretary of Agriculture, who was qualified or competent to fill the position of dean of the agricultural college of Wisconsin, and I sincerely hope that the determination of the courses of study in the agricultural colleges of this land will not be turned over to the Secretaries of Agriculture who may hereafter be named.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will insist on construing the amendment as it is now amended, which relates only to the courses in agriculture, as having an effect that would prevent the other courses being given in the same college, then, of course, there is no use of arguing that question. I am afraid, however, that the Senator did not pay attention to the amendment as it has been amended, which applies only to the agricultural line of study. The amendment provides:

Provided, That no State shall pay out any part of the appropriation provided in this act to any agricultural college until the governor of said State and the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States shall jointly approve the courses or departments of study that are being or are proposed to be, offered in said college or colleges.

That has nothing to do with any other courses, and the fact——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that.

Mr. McCUMBER. The fact that other courses are being taught will not prevent the college from receiving its proper proportion of this appropriation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand the amendment perfectly, and I have no qualification to make of what I have said.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, has that amendment really been presented? As printed it is stated that it is an amendment intended to be proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the Senator from Vermont has not formally presented the amendment. The Chair would inquire if the Senator submits it now?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, before we take up the substitute of the Senator from Vermont, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question in regard to the provision of his bill on page 4, beginning with line 18, which reads as follows:

And provided further, That in each State which shall assent to the provisions of this act there shall be expended each year for field instruction and demonstrations not less than 75 per cent of all moneys available under the provisions of this act.

I should like to inquire of the Senator, because I know he has given it a great deal of study, if that is not placing too strict a limitation on what shall be done with a large percentage of this money which it is proposed to appropriate?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is perhaps a little larger than I myself would have suggested, but I believe it is true that the practical demonstration work is the great work that will be accomplished by this bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator does not understand me. What I should like to know is what is meant by "demonstration work." The bill says "field demonstration." I have no objection to the taking of 75 per cent of the appropriation for demonstration in agriculture, but I should certainly object—and I want to make it strong enough, so that the Senator will understand me—and I shall certainly have to vote against the bill if this limitation is placed so that this money can be used for nothing but field demonstration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not so understand it. It is for field instruction and demonstration.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask the Senator from Georgia if he would be willing to strike out the word "field" and after the word "demonstrations" to add the two words "in agriculture," so as to make it read:

That in each State which shall assent to the provisions of this act there shall be expended each year for instruction and demonstrations in agriculture not less than 75 per cent, etc.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The entire appropriation is for instruction in agriculture. If we eliminate the word "field," and simply leave the word "instruction," it would take away any limitation at all in the bill as to the amount of demonstration work that is to be done. I understand that the object of that provision—it was a House amendment; it was not in the original bill—was to prevent the danger of the expenditure of any of this money at the college by requiring that the money be spent either in field instruction; that is to say, instruction on the field where the work was being illustrated by what was being done, or by demonstrations where the work was being demonstrated in reference to stock or cattle or dairying or actual farm work. Field instruction and demonstration require 75 per cent of the fund to be actually spent in practice in the illustration of scientific truths and in the presence of the farmers.

Mr. GRONNA. What I fear, Mr. President, is that this money can be used for no other purpose than field instruction. It may be that it would be unfortunate to strike out the word "field"; and I will ask the Senator if he would have any objection to inserting the two words "in agriculture" after the word "demonstrations"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So as to read "field instruction and demonstrations in agriculture"?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all.

Mr. GRONNA. I offer that amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator whether he has any doubt about the fact that "demonstrations in agriculture" would cover dairying?

Mr. GRONNA. In my opinion, that language would cover dairying.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is a matter which I would prefer to have passed upon by Senators who are familiar with dairying. Would the Senator have it read "demonstrations in agriculture," or "demonstrations in farm work"? Which would the Senator prefer?

Mr. GRONNA. I would prefer "in agriculture."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Very well. I accept that amendment, Mr. President—after the word "demonstrations," in line 20, page 4, to add "in agriculture."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, section 4, line 20, after the word "demonstrations," it is proposed to insert the words "in agriculture."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, in accordance with notice given on the 24th instant, I will offer an amendment.

I offer as a substitute for the bill now before the Senate, House bill 22871, the amendment which has been printed and placed upon the desk of each Senator. If I may be allowed to do so at this time, however, I should like to perfect my proposed amendment by adopting the amendments which have been adopted this morning to the original Lever bill, House bill No. 22871. Those amendments are as follows:

On page 2, section 2, line 22, after the words "demonstration work," to add the words:

And the farm management and farm-practice work of the Bureau of Plant Industry of the Department of Agriculture.

That, I will state, is an amendment that has been agreed to this morning to the so-called Lever bill.

On page 4, section 4, line 19, after the word "demonstrations"——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Vermont. As he has embodied in his substitute the exact bill as it came from the House, would it not be better to let that bill stand and offer his bill, beginning with section 10, as an amendment to the House bill? Then the Senate can consider the various lines of work in his amendment. It may adopt a number of them or it may adopt none of them, but those that it adopts it will simply add to the House bill; and the House bill will then go into conference, if any of them are adopted, with certain amendments setting out certain specific plans for additional work.

Is it necessary for the Senator to offer this now as a substitute, in view of the fact that he embodies as the first nine sections exactly the bill that came from the House? Would it not be easier just to offer the additional sections as amendments to the House bill?

Mr. PAGE. It seems to me, Mr. President, that from a parliamentary standpoint the proper way at this time is to move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert. Later on, if it is thought best to amend the bill in the way suggested by the Senator from Georgia, that may be done.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This is, therefore, an amendment proposing to strike out and reinsert exactly the same language. It is a motion to strike out nine sections and reinsert the nine sections.

Mr. PAGE. It is a motion to substitute a new bill from beginning to end, I confess, Senator. If there is a parliamentary objection, I shall, of course, yield to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. PAGE. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very much interested in this measure, and I hope the Senator from Vermont will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia. It will greatly simplify the whole proceeding. The issue is very plain. The Senator from Georgia has proposed, or the House has proposed, an additional contribution to agricultural education. The Senator from Vermont has not only proposed that contribution to agricultural education, but a contribution to vocational training or education.

I think it would simplify matters very much if the Senator from Vermont would allow the bill presented by the Senator from Georgia to stand, inasmuch as he does not propose to change it, and simply offer as an amendment that part of his bill which deals with the vocational education and additional appropriations for agricultural education. I believe we would get along with it a little faster if that were done.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I am very anxious to adopt whatever is the best and most proper course here. My suggestion on the 24th instant was that I would offer the amendment which has been placed upon the desks of Senators this morning. But I recognize the fact that the Senator from Iowa is a warm friend of the whole measure, and I am rather inclined to accept his wishes and his views, if the Chair informs me that that is the proper parliamentary procedure.

Having given notice that I would introduce this amendment as a whole, I will ask, as a matter of parliamentary procedure, whether I may properly omit at this time from my proposed amendment the first nine sections, which really are identical with House bill No. 22871, and move to amend the House bill by adding to it all of that portion of the proposed amendment which follows section 9?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the Senator's privilege. The Senator has not formally submitted his proposed amendment, and he can modify it in any way he chooses.

Mr. PAGE. Very well. Then I move, as an amendment to House bill No. 22871, now under discussion, the addition of all that portion of the amendment which I propose to submit, and which has been printed, after section 9, commencing with the words "Vocational Schools," on page 7.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I suggest that the Secretary read the proposed amendment. It has never been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment, as now offered, will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add to the bill the following additional sections:

VOCATIONAL SCHOOLS.

SEC. 10. That for the salaries of special instructors in agriculture and in home economics, giving training in these subjects to boys and girls over 12 years of age in rural high schools, the sum of $2,000,000 shall be, and hereby is, annually appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, such sum to be allotted annually to the States and the District of Columbia in proportion to the number of persons engaged in agricultural pursuits as shown by the Federal census next preceding the year for which such allotment is made. The moneys appropriated under this section shall be known as the rural-school fund: Provided, That the meaning of the words rural high schools as used in this act shall be determined (for each of the States and the District of Columbia) by the board for vocational education for each State and the District of Columbia; and that such instructors in agriculture shall have had actual experience in farming and such practical and technical preparation in agriculture as would be evidenced either by graduation from or not less than two years' attendance upon a college of agriculture or its equivalent; that such instructors in home economics shall have had actual experience in home making, and such practical and technical preparation in home economics as would be evidenced by not less than two years' special training in the subject or its equivalent; and that such special instructors in agriculture shall be required to give all their time, in connection with the school, solely to instruction in the theory and practice of agriculture, and to the direction and supervision of the work of pupils on the school or the home farm.

SEC. 11. That for the maintenance of instruction in the trades and industries and home economics in separate industrial or home economics schools giving vocational preparation of less than college grade, for work in the trades and industries or in the home through all-day, part-time, continuation, or evening classes designed to meet the vocational needs of persons over 14 years of age, the sum of $4,000,000 annually, beginning with the year ending June 30, 1916, such sum to be allotted annually to the States and the District of Columbia in proportion to their population engaged in trades and transportation and in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits, as shown by the Federal census next preceding the year for which such allotment is made. The moneys appropriated under this section shall be known as the industrial-school fund: Provided further, That such separate industrial or home economics school shall mean either a school having a separate plant and equipment and separate organization of teachers and courses of study under a distinctive management, or a separate and distinct vocational department or division, whose controlling purpose is to fit for useful employment, carried on in a regular school building under a separate head or director, together with a separate organization of pupils, studies, and teachers; that the part-time and continuation classes benefited by this act shall be those for persons engaged in or experienced in industrial or home-making vocations; that the evening classes benefited by this act shall be those for persons above 16 years of age employed during the day in the respective vocations for which they are given instruction; and that no such separate industrial or home economics school shall receive the benefit of this act which does not spend more than $5,000 annually for maintenance.

SEC. 12. That for the maintenance of instruction in agriculture and home economics in agricultural high schools, as hereinafter provided, the sum of $3,000,000 annually, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, such sum to be allotted annually to the States in proportion to the number of persons engaged in agricultural pursuits, as shown by the Federal census next preceding the year for which such allotment is made; and for each State with less than 100,000 people engaged in agriculture, according to such Federal census, the additional sum of $5,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and annually thereafter. The moneys appropriated under this section shall be known as the agricultural high-school fund.

SEC. 13. That for the preparation of teachers to give instruction in or closely related to agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics in departments or divisions of education in the State colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts of the respective States, the sum of $640,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and annually thereafter; of which annual appropriation $20,000 shall be allotted for the use and benefit of said departments or divisions in land-grant colleges in each of the 16 States which maintain separate land-grant colleges for persons of the colored race, $10,000 of which shall be for the education of persons of the white race and $10,000 for the education of persons of the colored race; and $10,000 shall be annually allotted for the use and benefit of said departments or divisions of education in each of those States which do not maintain separate land-grant colleges for persons of the colored race. The moneys appropriated under this section shall be known as the college teachers' training fund.

SEC. 14. That for the preparation of teachers to give instruction in or closely related to agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics in State normal schools and in State universities and in other schools furnishing special training for teachers, the sum of $1,000,000 annually, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, to be allotted annually to the States and the District of Columbia in proportion to their population as shown by the Federal census next preceding the year for which such allotment is made; and, for such instruction as in this section is provided, in each State with less than 300,000 inhabitants the additional sum of $3,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and annually thereafter. The moneys appropriated under this section shall be known as the teachers' training fund.

SEC. 15. That the sum of $40,000 annually, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in paying the necessary expenses of administering the provisions of this act relating to the rural-school fund, the industrial-school fund, the agricultural high-school fund, the college teachers' training fund, and the teachers' training fund; the sum of $15,000 annually, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture in paying the necessary expenses of giving advice and assistance, as herein provided, to the Secretary of the Interior in the administration of the provisions of this act relating to all schools giving training in agriculture and home economics and to the preparation of teachers in these vocations; the sum of $15,000 annually, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor in paying the necessary expenses of giving advice and assistance, as herein provided, to the Secretary of the Interior in the administration of the provisions of this act relating to instruction in the trades and industries and to the preparation of teachers for these vocations. The moneys appropriated under this section shall be known as the administration fund.

SEC. 16. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby charged with the duty, and to him is hereby given all necessary power, to administer the provisions of this act relating to the rural-school fund, the industrial-school fund, the agricultural high-school fund, the college teachers' training fund, and the teachers' training fund, to secure advice and assistance from the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor in carrying out the provisions of this act, in the making of investigations concerning education in the industries, home economics, and agriculture, and in the making of reports thereon; to cooperate with the State boards of vocational education herein provided for the respective States and the District of Columbia in developing the work of schools and in the training of teachers benefited by this act; and to give to such boards for vocational education such advice and assistance as will best enable them to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 17. That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby charged with the duty, and to him is hereby given all necessary power, to aid the Secretary of the Interior by giving advice and assistance to him in carrying out the provisions of this act relating to instruction in agriculture and home economics and to the preparation of teachers for these vocations, and to make such investigations in relation to agriculture and home economics and such reports thereon as may be necessary in discharging this responsibility.

SEC. 18. That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is hereby charged with the duty, and to him is hereby given all necessary power, to aid the Secretary of the Interior by giving advice and assistance to him in carrying out the provisions of this act relating to instruction in the trades and industries and to the preparation of teachers for these vocations, and to make investigations relating to education and research in the trades and industries and issuing reports thereon.

SEC. 19. That in order to secure the benefits of the rural-school fund, the industrial-school fund, the agricultural high-school fund, the college teachers' training fund, or the teachers' training fund any State shall, through the legislative authority thereof, accept the provisions of this act relating to such fund and shall appoint the State treasurer custodian, to be known as custodian for vocational education, for all moneys received by such State from such fund, and shall provide for the proper custody, administration, and disbursement of such moneys, as herein provided; and the District of Columbia shall, through the commissioners thereof, accept the provisions of this act relating to such fund, and shall appoint a custodian of all the moneys received by the District of Columbia under this act, to be known as custodian for vocational education, and shall provide for the proper custody, administration, and disbursement of such moneys. Any State or the District of Columbia may accept the benefit of any one or more of such funds and may defer the acceptance of the benefit of any one or more of such funds, and shall be required to meet only the conditions imposed in relation to those funds the benefit of which it has accepted.

SEC. 20. That no State or the District of Columbia shall be entitled to the benefit of the rural-school fund, the industrial-school fund, the agricultural high-school fund, the college teachers' training fund, or the teachers' training fund until the legislative authority thereof shall, by law, have created or designated a board of control, to be known as the board for vocational education, consisting of not less than three members, and having all necessary power to cooperate with the Secretary of the Interior in the administration of the provisions of this act relating to such fund; and such a board for vocational education for any State or the District of Columbia may consist of the board of education or other body having charge of the administration of public education therein.

SEC. 21. That no State shall be entitled to the benefit of the agricultural high-school fund until it has, through the legislative authority thereof or through its board for vocational education, divided the State into districts, providing in each district for one agricultural high school; and in any State where separate agricultural high schools are provided for the negro race the legislative authority of such State may divide the entire State into districts, providing in each district for one such school for the white race, and may divide the entire State into other and different districts for the negro race, which need not be coterminous with those for the white race; but no such agricultural high school shall receive the benefit of this act which does not expend annually more than $10,000; but the total number of such agricultural high schools in any State shall not be less than 1 for each 15 counties nor more than 1 for each 5 counties or fraction of five counties. Any such agricultural high school shall be open to admission without tuition charges and upon the same conditions to all persons otherwise qualified as herein provided residing in the district in which such school is located; but such school may be supported and controlled by the State, or by the district in which it is located, or by a portion thereof.

SEC. 22. That in order to secure the benefit of the rural-school fund, the agricultural-school fund, the college teachers' training fund, or the teachers' training fund, the board for vocational education for each State and the District of Columbia shall adopt, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and place in operation a general administrative scheme or plan, with such modifications as may be made from time to time, for the proper distribution of moneys to schools and colleges as herein provided; for the inspection and approval of such schools and colleges under the provisions of this act; and for the formulation and application in such inspection and approval of standards and requirements in vocational education as to types of schools, location, course of study, qualifications of teachers, methods of instruction, conditions of admission, and employment of pupils. In order that such a plan may be adapted to the needs of the State or the District of Columbia in which it is to become operative, the Secretary of the Interior shall, in passing upon it and its modifications from time to time, take into consideration the social, economic, industrial, educational, and administrative conditions, and all other relevant circumstances in such a State or the District of Columbia. It shall be the duty of such board for vocational education for any State or the District of Columbia to make annually to the Secretary of the Interior a full and detailed report of its administration of the provisions of this act relating to all such schools and colleges as herein provided, and to make such additional statements and reports as may be required by the Secretary of the Interior in the discharge of his responsibility under this act.

SEC. 23. That any school or college receiving funds under this act in any State or the District of Columbia shall, in order to receive the benefits of this act, conform to the requirements of the board for vocational education of such State or the District of Columbia; shall cooperate with such board in the development of the work of such school or college as herein provided; shall make to the board for vocational education of such a State or the District of Columbia a full and detailed report of its operations in the administration of the funds received by it under this act, including a detailed statement of receipts and expenditures from all sources for this purpose; and shall make such additional statements and reports as may be required by such board for vocational education in the discharge of its responsibility for such school under this act.

SEC. 24. That in order that any State or the District of Columbia may receive the benefit of the rural-school fund, the industrial-school fund, the agricultural high-school fund, the college teachers' training fund, or the teachers' training fund under this act it shall be the duty of the custodian for vocational education of such State or the District of Columbia, as herein provided, to make annually to the board for vocational education of such State or the District of Columbia a full and detailed report of his administration of the moneys received by him from such fund, as herein provided, and to make from time to time such additional statements and reports relating to moneys received by him from the rural-school fund, the industrial-school fund, the agricultural high-school fund, the college teachers' training fund, or the teachers' training fund as may be required by such board for vocational education.

SEC. 25. That the Secretary of the Interior shall annually, upon the basis of the annual reports and recommendations made by the board for vocational education for any State or the District of Columbia, together with such of his responsibility, ascertain whether such State or the District of Columbia is using moneys received by it out of the rural-school fund, the industrial-school fund, the agricultural high-school fund, the college teachers' training fund, or the teachers' training fund, in accordance with the spirit and terms of this act. On or before the 1st day of July in each year after this act becomes operative he shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury as to each State or the District of Columbia whether it has complied with the provisions of this act and is entitled to receive its share of such fund, as herein provided for such State or the District of Columbia, and the amounts from such fund which each State or the District of Columbia is entitled to receive. Upon the certification of the Secretary of the Interior, as herein provided, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay quarterly in advance to the custodian for vocational education of such State or the District of Columbia the moneys to which it is entitled for such schools under this act. Upon the requisition of the board for vocational education of such State or the District of Columbia such custodian shall pay to the governing board of any school or college or other authority legally qualified to receive moneys for such school or college the sum which it is entitled to receive under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 26. That the rural-school fund shall be used only for distinctive studies in or closely relating to agriculture and home economics; the industrial-school fund shall be used only for distinctive studies in or closely relating to the trades and industries and home economics; the agricultural-school fund shall be used only for distinctive studies in or closely relating to agriculture and home economics; the college teachers' training fund shall be used only by departments or divisions of education in these colleges and only in the preparation of teachers to give practical or technical instruction fitting for useful service in agriculture, the trades and industries, or the home; the teachers' training fund shall be used only for distinctive studies which are given in separate units organized as departments or divisions of State normal schools, universities, or other training schools under a properly qualified head, and which are designed to prepare teachers to give practical or technical instruction fitting for useful service in agriculture, the trades and industries, or home economics.

SEC. 27. That if any portion of the moneys received by the custodian for vocational education of any State or the District of Columbia under this act, for any given purpose named in this act, shall, by any action or contingency, be diminished, lost, or misapplied, it shall be replaced by such State or the District of Columbia, and until it is so replaced no subsequent appropriation for such purpose shall be paid to such State; no portion of any moneys appropriated under this act for the benefit of the States or the District of Columbia shall be applied, directly or indirectly, to the purchase, erection, preservation, or repair of any building or buildings or equipment, or to the purchase or rental of lands; and no portion of such moneys shall be expended other than in institutions supported and controlled by the public.

SEC. 28. That whenever it shall appear to the Secretary of the Interior, from the annual statement of receipts and expenditures of the custodian for vocational education of any State or the District of Columbia or otherwise, that a portion of the preceding annual disbursement made to such State or the District of Columbia from the rural-school fund, the industrial-school fund, the agricultural high-school fund, the college teachers' training fund, or the teachers' training fund remains unexpended, a sum equal to such portion or amount shall be deducted by him from the next succeeding annual disbursement from such fund to such State or the District of Columbia.

SEC. 29. That each State and the District of Columbia shall receive for the respective purposes herein provided only such portion of the full amount of any fund to which such State or the District of Columbia would otherwise be entitled as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, in the discharge of his responsibility under this act, it has made ample preparations to use to advantage. And all such moneys as would otherwise be allotted to the respective States and the District of Columbia, but as are not so allotted by the Secretary of the Interior, shall remain in the Treasury.

SEC. 30. That the Secretary of the Interior may withhold a certificate from any State or the District of Columbia for the whole or any part of its annual allotment of money out of any fund to which he decides it not to be entitled under the provisions of this act. If the Secretary of the Interior, as herein provided, shall withhold a certificate from any State or the District of Columbia for the whole or any part of its allotment, the facts and reasons therefor shall be reported to the President, in order that the State or the District of Columbia may, if it shall so desire, appeal to Congress from the determination of the Secretary of the Interior. If the next Congress shall not direct such sum to be paid, it shall be covered into the Treasury.

SEC. 31. That the moneys received by any State or the District of Columbia for any given purpose under the provisions of this act shall be used only for such purpose and shall be distributed among the institutions entitled to the benefit of such moneys in proportion to the amount which each expends out of other income derived from general or from local public funds for the same purpose during the same period; or such money shall be distributed on some other basis and according to some other plan previously adopted by the board for vocational education or by legislative authority for such State or the District of Columbia with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior; but there shall in no case be disbursed under the terms of this act to any school or college out of moneys derived from the rural-school department fund, the industrial-school fund, the agricultural-school fund, the college teachers' training fund, or the teachers' training fund, as provided by this act, more money than 50 per cent of the amount which is supplied and expended during the same period for the same purpose for which such fund is to be expended out of either State and local or State or local public moneys.

SEC. 32. That all States, Territories, and the District of Columbia accepting the benefit of any fund under this act shall provide other moneys with which to pay the cost of providing the necessary lands and buildings, and to pay the entire cost of all construction, supplementary to the practical and technical instruction provided for in this act, necessary in order to complete well-rounded courses of training, the main purposes of which are to give vocational as well as general preparation for agriculture, the trades and industries, and home making, or to prepare teachers for these vocations, suited to the needs of the respective sections and communities of the United States.

SEC. 33. That the Secretary of the Interior shall make an annual report to Congress on his administration of the rural-school department fund, the industrial-school fund, the agricultural high-school fund, the college teachers' training fund, and the teachers' training fund, under the provisions of this act, and on the work of the boards for vocational education of each State and the District of Columbia in their administration of the moneys received from such funds under the provisions of this act; and he shall make one or more reports to Congress, not later than June 30, 1915, concerning the organization of vocational education as provided for in this act.

SEC. 34. That Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal any or all the provisions of this act.

SEC. 35. That this act shall take effect immediately on its passage.

During the reading of the amendment,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The reading will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it might be well, as we read the amendment section by section, if any amendments are desired to be made to the paragraphs themselves, to consider them. I do not know what the Senator from Vermont would prefer. It just occurred to me that it would be well to adopt that course. Perhaps, though, the Senate ought to hear all of it, and then go back and take up the sections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it desirable that the amendment should be read in the first place.

After the conclusion of the reading of the amendment,

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suppose the Senator from Vermont will discuss the bill before we proceed to act upon it in detail. There are a number of suggested amendments that I want to make when we reach that stage of treating the subject.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I have previously discussed this bill somewhat at length. I presume the views of every Senator touching the bill are pretty well formed, and I do not care to take very much time, except as I may be asked concerning any point about the bill upon which any Senator desires information.

I will state my purpose in moving the amendment to the Lever bill, so called, H. R. 22871: For many months I have been trying to get action upon the original Senate bill No. 3. That action, as the junior Senator from Georgia well understands, has been postponed and objected to from time to time until he believes—and I do not know but that I agree with him in that belief—that to pass now the original bill, Senate bill No. 3, and send it to the House would probably mean that it would go into the Committee on Agriculture of that body, and that it would there die the death which comes to so many bills which we send over to the House toward the close of a session.

The bill which comes to us from the House and is under discussion at this time gives Federal aid to the adult farmer on the farm. There is no contention that it affords the slightest aid to industrial education or any education of any kind to the boys. If we are at this session of Congress to grant Federal aid to industrial education, it must be done by substituting Senate bill No. 3 for the House bill. In other words, Senators who are in favor of extending industrial education to the boy as provided by Senate bill No. 3 must vote for the amendment which I have offered, for it is probable that in no other way can we reach this legislation at this session. If the amendment which I have offered substituting the Page bill for the Lever bill is adopted, then the matter goes into conference, and out of that conference, it is believed, some bill carrying with it a measure of Federal aid to industrial education will result.

The claim has been made here that practically all the agricultural colleges of the country are against the so-called Page bill, Senate bill No. 3, and in the report of the Senator from Georgia on what is known as the Lever-Smith bill a large number of letters were printed from college men throughout the country, and notably college men connected with the colleges established under the so-called Morrill Act, to show their approval of the Lever bill.

I wish to say to the Senate that those letters of approval were quite largely written because of the belief that we could not at this session reach action on Senate bill No. 3, but that we might perhaps secure some legislation under what is known as the Lever bill.

I want to read some letters showing the real situation as to this matter. Here, for instance, is a letter from Connecticut. In the report of the Senator from Georgia on the Smith-Lever bill he quotes as follows:

President Connecticut Agricultural College: "My personal opinion is that carrying of the latest scientific knowledge to the working farmer is one of the most important duties of the land-grant colleges. I sincerely hope that this bill will have favorable consideration by the present session of Congress."

I have a letter bearing date December 28, 1912—months and months after the above was written—in which the president of the Connecticut Agricultural College, Charles L. Beach, uses this language:

I am informed that the Lever extension bill and the Page vocational bill are scheduled for consideration in the Senate. I have urged our Connecticut Senators, FRANK B. BRANDEGEE and GEORGE P. MCLEAN, to use their influence in securing favorable action on the Lever bill for the reason that I believed that this was the only measure which could be passed the present session.

Senator MCLEAN writes me, however, that the Page vocational bill can be passed in the Senate.

Personally, I am in favor of the broader bill, as I believe the time is ripe to make a beginning in vocational education. I am writing Senators BRANDEGEE and MCLEAN to this effect.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. PAGE. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As we are likely to come to a vote upon the bill this afternoon and as the author of the substitute is now upon the floor, I venture to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska suggests the absence of a quorum, and the roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Crawford	Johnston, Tex.	Sanders
Bourne	Culberson	Kern	Shively
Bradley	Cullom	La Follette	Simmons
Brandegee	Cummins	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Briggs	Dillingham	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Bristow	Dixon	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Brown	du Pont	Myers	Stephenson
Bryan	Fletcher	Newlands	Sutherland
Burnham	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Swanson
Burton	Gamble	Overman	Thornton
Catron	Gardner	Page	Tillman
Chamberlain	Gronna	Percy	Wetmore
Chilton	Heiskell	Perkins	Williams
Clapp	Hitchcock	Perky
Clark, Wyo.	Johnson, Me.	Richardson
Clarke, Ark.	Johnston, Ala.	Root

Mr. THORNTON. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER] on account of sickness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. ASHURST]. I desire to let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to state that the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is detained at his home by a bereavement in his family.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] are at the present time in Michigan attending the funeral of the late Congressman WEDEMEYER.

Mr. SANDERS. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. LEA].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll 61 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I was referring to the fact that in the report which accompanied the Lever bill it was made to appear that the educators of this country were opposed to the Page bill and in favor of the Lever bill. I have had the letters which appeared in the report on the Lever bill placed side by side with those which I have personally received, and in many cases the fact appears that their opposition, if they have opposition, to the Page bill was because they feared it could not pass and they wanted the Lever bill to pass rather than have no legislation.

I do not propose to take up the time of the Senate by reading these letters, but I think I will read one more as a sample of the many I have received showing these college presidents have been induced to favor the Lever bill under the impression that it would be impossible to pass any other bill at this session. J. J. Vernon, the dean of the College of Agriculture of Florida, is one of those said to favor the Lever bill. I want to ask Senators to carefully listen while I read his letter to me stating why he had indorsed the Lever bill:

Hon. CARROLL S. PAGE:

Replying to your communication of the 16th ultimo, which came to this office during my absence on extension work for boys' and girls' clubs, I wish to say that I consider the Page bill the best educational bill which has ever been prepared and presented for congressional action. It is a bill comprehensive and practical, and will meet the southern needs. I am satisfied that the leading educators of the whole country are in favor of the Page bill, but it seems to be largely a question of getting a bill through carrying such a large appropriation at the present session of Congress.

I want you to know that I am entirely with you for the Page bill at any time it can be passed, but I am sure that you and your forces will, if it becomes necessary, transfer your support to the best measure that is most likely to be enacted into law.

I consider the seconday educational part the most important feature of the Page bill. It would reach the greatest number of young men and young women at the age when most could be done, and therefore I consider all the other parts of the bill of lesser importance. If there is anything I can do to assist you, please command me.

J. J. VERNON.

Note that Dean Vernon thinks the Lever bill of secondary importance and that the most important part is that which pertains to the secondary-education features of the Page bill.

I have a letter from the dean of the school of commerce, accounts, and finance, of New York University, Joseph French Johnson, in which he says:

NEW YORK UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF COMMERCE,
ACCOUNTS, AND FINANCE,
New York City, January 3, 1913.

Hon. CARROLL S. PAGE,
The Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR PAGE: I have examined very carefully the provisions of Senate bill 3, for the encouragement of vocational education among the States, and shall consider it a national calamity if this bill or something very much like it does not become a law.

My own education was of the old-fashioned kind. When I left college I was able to do nothing except teach school. As I was qualified to teach only languages and literature, and not well fitted even for that work, the profession of teaching did not appeal to me. I broke into newspaper work at a few dollars a week, and after four years' apprenticeship became the financial editor of a Chicago daily. I then had occasion to discover that few bankers and business men had been specially trained for their vocations and that many of them in consequence were making costly blunders. I resolved that if ever I became teacher again I would devote myself to working out a scheme of education for business men. The call came in 1893, and since then I have been engaged in vocational education.

You are entirely right in your contention that vocational education will have a cultural effect. My own view is that culture is a by-product of education. It should not be the thing aimed at. Young people are not interested in it, and we old folks can't define it. Most of our children don't want to go to school because they can't see any possible connection between school and life.

The measure for which you are fighting, if it becomes a law, will do much more than furnish several thousand young people an opportunity to fit themselves for useful careers. It will give the American people an object lesson in real education and will set them to wondering why they are spending so many million dollars on a public-school system that is wasting a tremendous amount of their children's time and energy.

So I am heartily in favor of the bill for which you are sponsor, and I congratulate you on having made a very luminous and convincing presentation of its merits.

Very truly, yours, JOS. FRENCH JOHNSON.

I do not know how Mr. Gompers may be regarded personally by Senators here, but if there is any man authorized to speak for that great labor organization, the American Federation of Labor, it is Samuel Gompers. He has written a letter of considerable length in support of the vocational education features of the Page bill, and, with the consent of the Senate, I will ask that it be printed without reading. I want to shorten debate as much as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1913.

Hon. CARROLL S. PAGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In connection with pending legislation on industrial education, I beg to hand you herewith the report which the executive council of the American Federation of Labor submitted to the last annual convention, held at Rochester, N. Y., November 11–25, 1912, the report of the committee on education, to which this matter was referred, and the action of the convention thereon.

These matters are submitted to you for your information as to the declaration of the last annual convention of the American Federation of Labor on this subject and for your serious consideration in connection with pending legislation.

Very respectfully, yours,

SAML. GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

(Report of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor on industrial education, submitted to the Rochester convention of the American Federation of Labor, November 11–25, 1912.)

INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION.

In December, 1911, a conference was called by Senator PAGE, of Vermont, to give technical consideration to his bill, S. 3, which provided for vocational education and trade training. Reference to this bill has been made by us in our previous reports. Prominent educators, agriculturalists, and representative employers, together with the legislative committee of the American Federation of Labor, considered proposed amendments to the bill and the best methods to pursue in order to secure favorable action. Senator PAGE reintroduced his bill with the suggested changes. Most of these were embodied in the technical features and in the agricultural extension sections of the bill. They were not applicable to the interests of urban labor represented by the American Federation of Labor. The result was that when the amended bill was considered by the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Senator PAGE was ordered to report it favorably to the Senate. This was done on February 26, 1912.

The Senate considered the bill on June 14, July 24, August 10, 18, and 22. It still holds its place upon the Senate calendar, and, in accordance with a tacit agreement among the Senators, will be given further consideration in the third session of the Sixty-second Congress. It is the opinion of some enthusiastic supporters of the measure that it will be passed. Its enactment will depend upon the nature of the support given by those who have been urging its passage. This industrial education bill has been handicapped to some extent by the persistency with which several Congressmen, particularly some from the Southern States, have been urging the passage of that section of the bill relating to agricultural colleges and experiment stations, without regard to the other provisions of the bill dealing with industrial and vocational education and training.

The bill H. R. 22871, by Representative LEVER, of South Carolina, was introduced by him on April 4. It is limited to agricultural educational extension work exclusively. It was referred to the House Committee on Agriculture.

Representative WILLIAM B. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, had previously reintroduced his bill (new number H. R. 21490), which had been changed to conform to its companion bill, S. 3, by Senator PAGE. Mr. WILSON'S bill was also referred to the House Committee on Agriculture. A tentative understanding was reached between the chairman of the House committee, Mr. LAMB, and Mr. WILSON that no action should be taken on the Lever bill until after an opportunity had been afforded Mr. WILSON and the friends of his bill to be heard by the House committee. In accordance with this understanding, Mr. WILSON arranged with the chairman for hearings on his bill, to commence on April 23. He invited those desiring to be heard to come prepared to make their statements before the committee on that date. He took charge of the hearings, which continued for four days. The legislative committee of the American Federation of Labor, appearing in cooperation with other advocates, urged that the Wilson vocational trade-training bill be favorably reported. The Lever bill was reported favorably by the committee on April 13, passed by the House on August 23, and referred to the Senate Committee on Agriculture August 24.

At our meeting in January, after the industrial education bill had been given some consideration, we directed Secretary Morrison to request the members of the special committee on industrial education to meet concurrently with our next meeting, May 9. The Page bill was discussed by several members of the committee at that meeting.

A digest of the special report of the United States Commissioner of Labor on industrial education was discussed by us. The American Federation of Labor committee on industrial education recommended to us that Mr. Charles H. Winslow be requested and authorized to prepare a final report for the committee, this report to be submitted to this convention as directed by the Atlanta convention. We complied with that request, and Mr. Winslow performed this service.

At the following meeting of the executive council we had before us the report of Mr. Winslow as accepted by the American Federation of Labor special committee on industrial education. It was discussed, and it was decided that inasmuch as the document was of such great public value, was such a magnificent contribution to the literature upon the questions of industrial education, vocational training, household economics, and civics, that it should be made a public document by authority of Congress. Senator PAGE readily obtained the consent of the United States Senate to have it printed as a Senate document. It has been so printed, and is known as Senate document 936, Sixty-second Congress, second session. Several thousand copies of this document have already been distributed, and a sufficient number are at the convention so that each delegate may have a copy. The members of affiliated organizations should request their respective United States Senators to send them copies for educational institutions and for the labor unions.

INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION.

The committee has considered that portion of the executive council's report under the caption "Industrial education," and desires to express its appreciation of the splendid work of both the special and the general committees on that question. The work and the report of the general committee on education includes a study of every scheme of vocational education in the United States and presents in detail in the briefest possible manner the work done in the schools investigated. The report, which is printed in pamphlet form and contains 114 pages, will be distributed to the delegates to this convention, and we urge that each delegate read carefully this very valuable handbook on this matter which is so extremely important to our members.

The original action taken concerning vocational education was in accordance with a resolution adopted by the Denver convention of 1908. A special committee on industrial education was appointed to investigate and report on the subject matter to the Toronto convention. In compliance with the resolution, the committee made a preliminary report, but later, by authority of the Toronto convention, the life of the committee was extended so that it might further pursue its studies in the light of a searching investigation, which was being carried on by the United States Bureau of Labor.

The investigation and report made by the United States Bureau of Labor, undertaken at the request of the American Federation of Labor's committee on industrial education, is believed to be the most comprehensive inquiry ever made on the subject in the United States.

Text of the resolution creating the special committee on industrial education is as follows:

"The president, in conjunction with the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint a special committee of at least 15, to be composed of the majority of trade-union members of this convention, who will serve without compensation and incur no expenses other than the necessary and legitimate expenditure within the judgment of the president and the executive council, to investigate the methods and means of industrial education in this country and abroad, and to report its findings, conclusions, and recommendations to the next annual meeting of the American Federation of Labor."

The final make-up of the committee follows:

John Mitchell, chairman, Frank Duffy, secretary, Samuel Gompers, Frank Morrison, James Duncan, D. A. Hayes, William D. Huber, Joseph F. Valentine, John R. Alpine, H. B. Perham, Mrs. Raymond Robins, Miss Agnes Nestor, Dr. Charles P. Neill, Hon. W. B. Wilson, Rev. Charles Stelzle, Charles H. Winslow, Edward Hirsch, John Golden, James Wilson, James O'Connell, John B. Lennon, Hugh Frayne, James Roach, Stuart Reid.

SCOPE OF THE RESOLUTION.

From the terms of the resolution under which the committee was constituted it is evident that what was desired was:

1. A thorough investigation of the needs of industrial education.

2. A statement of the extent to which the needs are now met by existing institutions.

3. As the result of such investigations, some definite suggestions for the promotion of industrial education in such manner as might best serve the interests of the whole people.

POINT OF VIEW AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE COMMITTEE.

The committee entered upon its duties without fixed notions as to the form industrial education should take throughout the country, and in consequence, its inquiries and studies have made the most profound impression upon its members.

Keeping in mind the scope of the resolution, as well as the complexity of the situation, the committee addressed themselves to the following questions in an effort to bring out practical suggestions toward the solution of the problem:

1. Should trade, vocational, technical, and industrial schools be established as a part of the public-school system?

2. Should private industrial educational institutions be tolerated?

3. Under what conditions and terms should industrial schools, either public or private, be countenanced and supported?

4. Under what conditions should the semiprivate or semipublic industrial schools, namely, the so-called cooperative industrial schools, be approved or disapproved?

5. Should they be free or supported by the city, county, or State in which they are located?

6. Should they be under the control or partial control of the National Government?

7. Should their instructors be practical men from the ranks of trade occupations, or should they be men who know nothing of the trade itself except its theoretical side?

8. What should be taught under the head of "industrial education"; the cultural side, the professional side, the practical side, or all combined?

9. To what extent, if any, should labor headquarters, labor temples, and labor halls be used to furnish industrial education?

10. To what extent should "prevocational courses" be encouraged?

11. What disposition shall be made of the product of industrial schools?

POINT OF VIEW.

After an extensive as well as intensive study of the entire subject, covering a period of more than three years, examining the many experiments now in vogue, ascertaining through first-hand information the purposes and merits of the several type of school now prevailing, the committee is prepared to offer the following as a partial solution of the above questions.

In regard to 1: Should trade, vocation, technical, and industrial schools be established as a part of the public-school system?

We believe that technical and industrial education of the workers in trades and industry, being a public necessity, should not be a private but a public function, conducted by the public, the expense involved at public cost and as part of the public-school system. In order to keep such schools in close touch with the trades and industries there should be local advisory boards, including representatives of the industries, the employers, and organized labor.

In regard to 2: Should private industrial educational institutions be tolerated?

Organized labor's position regarding the injustice of narrow and prescribed training in selected trades by both private and public institutions, and the flooding of the labor market with half-trained mechanics for the purpose of exploitation, is perfectly tenable, and the well-founded belief in the viciousness of such practices and the consequent condemnation is well-nigh unassailable.

In regard to 3: Under what conditions and terms should industrial schools, either public or private, be countenanced and supported?

We believe in private initiative, coupled with active cooperation between the school authorities and the trade-unions, or private undertakings which are manifestly for the educational advancement of trade-union members.

In regard to 4: Under what conditions should the semiprivate or the semipublic industrial schools, namely, the so-called cooperative industrial schools, be approved or disapproved?

The problem is divided into two parts, as follows:

(a) Public control of cooperative schools, as follows:

(b) Private control of cooperative schools.

As to (a) the cooperative-school plan is an attempt to combine training in the processes and practices of trades, in manufacturing or other establishments, with general instruction in a school which includes theory plus academic studies that bear directly on the trade work. The details of such systems vary, but the most popular is the half-time plan.

In the last analysis industrial education will be measured by intensely practical men of the industrial world on the basis of skill and intelligence as developed by undertakings to fit the youth of the country for wage-earning occupations. In order to meet this test successfully apprentices must be trained under real conditions in productive industry, thereby making the cooperative-school plan a necessary feature of our public-school system.

The public schools should teach the theory of the trade, while the actual practice and processes should be taught in the shop. This method permits of continuous development of capacity and relieves the manufacturer of the expense of the theoretical instruction, and provides a means of weeding out boys who are not adapted to particular trades.

By this method the boy, the employer, and the community are benefited. The obligation to provide industrial education of a theoretical nature, therefore, should rest entirely with the public schools.

As to (b) private control of cooperative schools:

The committee reaffirms its position in condemning any system of public instruction privately controlled, or any scheme of private selection of pupils, and calls attention to the introduction of a plan which is being put into operation in several localities and fostered by manufacturers' associations.

This cooperative scheme is a limited plan for industrial education, carried on between the high school, which engages a teacher for the purpose, one satisfactory to the manufacturers, and a group of the latter who indenture such boys as they desire to have. The idea is, of course, to give a thorough training. But—

(a) The manufacturer is not obliged to take any boys or to keep any boy.

On the other hand the high school is obliged to educate all duly qualified boys, to give them all that the city provides.

Therefore those who study in such a cooperative course do so on sufferance.

In regard to 5: Should they (the schools) be free, supported by the city, county, or State in which they are located?

The committee reaffirms its advocacy of free schools, free text books, the raising of the compulsory school age, and a close scrutiny of courses and methods of instruction.

In regard to 6: Should they (the schools) be under the control or partial control of the National Government?

Results vast in importance and magnitude have come from the action in Congress in 1862 in giving land grants to each State to be used for State colleges of agriculture and mechanic arts. This appropriation of lands, followed by direct appropriation of moneys in 1890 and 1907, provides these colleges with a fund averaging about $65,000 per State, or a total of over $3,000,000 annually. While the funds so appropriated were for a long time used largely for general studies, the subjects of mechanic arts, agriculture, and home economics were finally developed, so that they now compete on nearly equal terms with the literary and scientific courses.

Since most of this fund is in demand to train engineers, technical agriculturists, and teachers in the mechanic, agriculture, and home economics subjects, comparatively little is available to give school training to those who wish to become experienced workmen, farmers, or home makers.

There is a movement at present, in which labor is taking a prominent part, to still further develop education to which these colleges were dedicated. Since only one college in a State can do little more for our greatly enlarged population than to provide courses of study for those who are to become technicians, and can not give equal opportunity in liberal and practical education to all of the industrial classes, this new movement is crystallizing around a plan for including the secondary public schools under the scope of additional similar grants, thus creating and giving direction to a complete national scheme of education in which labor should receive recognition and its just share of attention.

In regard to 7: Should their instructors be practical men from the ranks of trade occupations, or should they be men who know nothing of the trade itself except its theoretical side?

The committee believes that experience in European countries has shown that academically trained teachers have been dismal failures. Notwithstanding this experience, many so-called trade or vocational schools in the United States have in the recent past attempted experiments with academically trained teachers with very unsatisfactory or disastrous results.

The teachers of trade and manual vocations must keep up with modern shop practices and processes in establishments which are doing regular productive work; otherwise they will fall far behind and be teachers of obsolete methods and processes. Successful teachers must be men of practical experience, with more than a text-book acquaintance with the industrial world.

A good trade teacher needs at least a fair general education, with specialized knowledge of such arts or sciences as may be related to the trade he is to teach; a practical knowledge of the trades such as is usually gained only by working at them under the ordinary shop conditions and in addition an understanding of the general principles of teaching, that he may be able to impart his knowledge to others. The combination is not a common one. To be a skilled trade worker presupposes years of training and experience in the shop, and men possessing this have usually begun work by 16, with only a grammar-school education at most. Even if they have added to this by night study they have had no experience in teaching and find much difficulty in imparting their own knowledge to learners. The trained teachers, on the other hand, while thoroughly familiar with the theory and underlying principles of the trades, usually lack concrete and practical experience with industrial processes. As a general rule, therefore, the school has to choose between the skilled worker not trained as a teacher and the professionally trained teacher who knows the theory of the trades but has little, if any, practical experience.

In regard to 8: What should be taught under the head of "industrial education"; the cultural side, the professional side, the practical side, or all combined?

The committee believes that the course of instruction in a school giving industrial education should include English, mathematics, mechanics, physical trades, elementary mechanics, and drawing; the shop instruction for particular trades and for each trade represented; drawing, mathematics, mechanics, physical and biological science applicable to the trade, the history of that trade, and a sound system of economics, including and emphasizing the philosophy of collective bargaining. This, it is believed, will serve to prepare the pupil for more advanced subjects and, in addition, disclose his capacity for a specific vocation.

In regard to 9: To what extent, if any, should labor headquarters, labor temples, and labor halls be used to further industrial education?

The committee is convinced that there are conspicuous activities throughout the country known as "educational hours" at central labor-union meetings which might well be exemplified to advance and organize a propaganda for industrial education. Such meetings might also be turned into an educational "forum" in the interest or advocacy of membership by trade-unionists on both State and municipal educational boards and committees.

In regard to 10: To what extent should "prevocational courses" be encouraged?

For more than a decade the introduction of properly balanced courses in trade training and the enrichment of these courses have embarrassed the advocates of industrial education not a little; in fact, attempts to scientifically analyze processes and practices of the trades have met with resentment on the part of superintendents, supervisors, and foremen of large industrial establishments. The reason for this resentment is that those usually seeking such information are manual-training school teachers, unfortunately the greater number of whom are women. Moreover, it is conceded that such teachers have very little sympathy with trades, as such, but look upon manual and trade instruction as a way out of the difficulty of educating the subnormal pupil. Hence, the objection of those interested in trades or trade education to thrusting upon industry the dull boy.

On the other hand, even public trade school instructors in some instances have turned a deaf ear to what they call impertinent inquiries as to methods of procedure. Such instructors usually consider the proper kind of equipment, processes, and practices necessary for the training of apprentices "their stock in trade." However, insistent demand that rule-of-thumb methods be abolished has resulted in genuine attempts to teach the trades scientifically, systematically, and sympathetically.

As a result of this new era in the advancement of scientifically arranged courses with the necessary equipment, it seems eminently proper at this time to point out the overwhelming desire on the part of the advocates of manual-training schools to establish within such schools and elsewhere "prevocational courses" for pupils between the ages of 12 and 14.

While we welcome practical courses for those who are to later enter upon specialized vocational and industrial courses, we maintain that "prevocational courses" should be taught by tutors with practical knowledge of the vocations toward which the pupils are to be pointed; in other words, we can not too strongly condemn any attempt to thrust upon school systems courses of instruction which presume to try out the adaptability of the pupils for particular vocations and which are taught by women teachers with absolutely no practical knowledge of the metal, woodworking, and such other trades for which instruction may be offered.

If "prevocational courses" are to be offered in publicly administered schools in an effort to establish a scheme of vocational guidance, then we insist that such courses be given by men tutors, who not only have a practical knowledge of the particular trades, but, in addition, teaching experience coupled with an insight into the adaptability and inclination of the pupils for such vocations. (Same to apply to trades and vocations in which women are exclusively employed.)

Finally, we favor and advocate increasing the number of men teachers in industrial schools, as well as "prevocational schools," to the end that all practical instruction in trades be given by properly trained teachers, who have had in addition to their teaching experience at least four years' practical experience at particular trades.

In regard to 11: What disposition shall be made of the product of industrial schools?

A most serious and troublesome question arises concerning the disposition of the product of industrial schools. If the teaching of any trade in its entirety is to turn out journeymen, near journeymen, or all-round workmen, then there must necessarily be a product which will have a commercial value. If it is not, the work has not been carried on as it would be under real commercial conditions and the training therefore is imperfect.

If the product of these schools is to be put upon the market in any way, there is likely to be much opposition from manufacturers, contractors, and organized labor. Since it will inevitably come into competition with the product of regular establishments, it has been pointed out that if the students were regular apprentices in industrial establishments, they would be working as much in competition with apprentices and journeymen in other establishments as if they were doing the same kind of work and producing the same kind of articles in the schools. This meets the objection only partially from the standpoint of labor and not at all from that of the employer. In both cases the objection is to what may be called subsidized competition; competition which is not hampered by the necessity of making its product pay for its own cost of production. The difficulty does not, of course, arise in apprenticeship schools in which a manufacturer trains his own employees, but in philanthropic and public industrial schools it presents a serious problem, for which as yet no satisfactory solution has been found.

As previously stated in this report, the committee believes that instruction should be given for its educational value, or, in other words, it should be "construction for instruction rather than instruction for construction."

An agreement between school authorities and contractors who are erecting public buildings, whereby pupils of schools given instruction in building trades, shall be permitted during a part of the time to make practical application of their training, on buildings in course of erection, the pupils to receive credit for such work as part of their course, has been suggested as a feasible and unobjectionable plan. Similarly the work under the various city departments has been suggested to provide practice for pupils in many other trades.

This in no way is a new experiment, as practical application of the same is being made in foreign countries with considerable success.

A minor difficulty in connection with a product having a commercial value is the temptation to increase output by keeping the student longer at one machine or operation than is absolutely necessary for practical educational purposes; in other words, there may be a tendency, for the sake of revenue, to follow the example of the shop and specialize instead of giving well-rounded training. This, however, is a matter of school administration, but, nevertheless, of great concern and can be easily guarded against if the right attitude is shown by school administrators.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

The committee after due consideration of the importance of the several systems of schools now in operation throughout the country, recommend the following specific types of schools for the advancement of the prospective apprentice to the trades, as well as for those who have already entered the trades:

1. Supplemental technical education: Supplemental technical education for those already in the trades. The demand for such instruction is measured by the necessity for training in particular trades and industries, and the chief aim of such instruction should be to present those principles of arts and sciences which bear upon the trades either directly or indirectly. Such schools are commonly known as "continuation schools," whether their sessions are held in the day, evening, or on the part-time plan.

2. Industrial education: The establishment of schools in connection with the public-school systems, at which pupils between the ages of 14 and 16 may be taught the principles of trades, not necessarily in separate buildings but in schools adapted to this particular education by competent trade-trained teachers.

3. Trade-union schools: The committee recomends the continuance of progressive development in supplemental trade education as inaugurated by trade-unions, such as the supplemental trade courses established by the International Typographical Union; School for Carpenters and Bricklayers, Chicago, Ill.; International Printing Pressmen's Technical School, at Rogersville, Tenn., and the School for Carriage, Wagon and Automobile Workers, of New York City. The establishment of the Printing Pressmen's Technical Trade School, following the example set by the International Typographical Union, marks another epoch in the introduction of trade education by trade-unions.

That the typographical union and the printing pressmen should be the first trades-unions to establish such schools was a foregone conclusion, for in proportion as occupation makes claim on the intellect of the workers greater educational opportunities become necessary.

Those trades which call for the greatest intellectual or technical skill on the part of the worker afford the most available opportunities for educational activity.

It is not because the personnel in the printing trades is better, but rather because these occupations are becoming increasingly more technical and subdivided in their character.

The committee further recommends that all trade-unions which have not adopted a scheme of technical education give the matter the consideration it so richly deserves; and they further believe that the undertakings of the above unions call for the most enthusiastic admiration and are entitled to the most cordial and loyal support.

4. We recommend that if in the course of time schools under public administration with a broad and liberal course of instruction (with an advisory committee composed of employers as well as trade-unionists) shall demonstrate practical efficiency in training workers for the highly skilled trades, we favor the recognition of that portion of time spent in the schools which, after an examination by the union at interest of the practical and theoretical ability of the apprentice, can be considered comparable to actual training in particular trades as a substitute for a period of the apprentice's time spent entirely in the industry.

FEDERAL AID.

In addition to the above recommendations and in compliance with the action of the St. Louis convention regarding Federal aid for vocational education, this committee urges a greater interest in the education of the 25,000,000 children of school age in the United States, 50 per cent of whom leave school by the end of the sixth grade at approximately 14 years of age.

Not only are we confronted by this state of affairs, but of the 50 per cent who remain in school only 1 child in 3 finishes the eighth grade, only 1 in 5 enters the high school, and only 1 in 30 finishes the high-school courses. Some idea of the extent of this vast problem can be gleaned when it is realized that the cost of maintenance of the common schools of the country is $500,000,000 a year. In addition to this sum there has been expended for the equipment in these school plants $1,000,000,000, and the benefits of this enormous expenditure are enjoyed by only 50 per cent of the children of school age.

The vocational education bill, known as Senate 3, introduced by Senator PAGE, of Vermont (a similar bill having been introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman WILSON) is one of several introduced in Congress to advance the cause of vocational education throughout the States by a liberal Federal grant for agriculture, the trades and industries, as well as home economics. The passage of this bill has been hindered somewhat by the activities of certain Senators who are opposed to its provisions but in favor of another bill much narrower in scope and relating only to colleges and experiment stations, while the Page bill includes all such provisions and in addition creates a plan for Federal grants to secondary public schools, thus giving direction to a complete scheme of education in which all the children of the Nation should receive a just and equitable share of attention.

Much time and attention has already been given to this bill by the president of the American Federation of Labor, as well as by the legislative committee, and considerable hope has been expressed for its ultimate success. It still holds its place on the Senate calendar and is to be considered early in the third session of the Sixty-second Congress, which meets in December of this year. Every effort should be made to secure such legislation guaranteeing high Federal standards with the widest possible latitude within the States for adaptation to the specific needs of the various communities.

Respectfully submitted.

A motion was made and seconded that the report of the committee be concurred in.

Delegate LYNCH (J. M.): As an encouragement to the unions that may have under consideration following the example set by the International Typographical Union, I may state that we now have 3,500 students of our craft. I think there are very few colleges that have as large a student body, and as a result those printers who have taken it have benefited by it; a great many of them have been able to secure a scale of wages in excess of the prices running from $2 to $15 a week. So we are getting practical results through the education we are conducting through an educational commission made up entirely of printers and located in Chicago. I make this as a statement of facts, not theory.

Treasurer LENNON, in discussing the question, said in part: I want to say just a few words on this question because of my contact with educators, and because of the knowledge of the situation that they believe, at least, confronts them. They are not intentionally antagonistic in the main to our movement.

Many of them, as a matter of course, do not understand. The idea of vocational or trade education is becoming very general among the educators of this country. The first question they ask is, "Where are we to get the teachers that you trade-unionists advocate shall be used?" Now, my friends, that is not a question that can be answered offhand; it is a question we must help the educators and school boards to solve. We can not stop the trend in the direction of this kind of education in the schools; but we can, if we cooperate with the educators, have it come our way. There will be some mistakes made, as a matter of course, but we can afford to overlook them and correct them.

I know of members of our organizations who have been furnished with the reports of the special committee and have never taken the trouble to read them. How can they intelligently meet the question with the educators of their various communities? In the various States this question is going to the country schools, not only to the city schools, but the little schools at the crossroads. They are proposing to teach domestic science and a moderate knowledge of the carpenters' trade and the blacksmiths' trade. Now, if we will cooperate with the educators we will see that this is done in a way that is beneficial and not detrimental to those trades.

I desire to impress upon the trades-unionists here, and through the men here those at home, the necessity of giving careful examination to what the special committee has done during the last three or four years. It is great work and it is entitled to consideration, because it is more important, as it has to do with the welfare of our children and grandchildren, than possibly any other matter that has been or will be considered by this convention.

Delegate FREY, in discussing the question said, in part, "This question of industrial education is such an important one to us as trades-unionists, and has never yet received that careful study it deserves, that I feel warranted in taking up a few moments of the convention's time to express a thought or two in connection with the subject. Every one of us is familiar with the fact that the trend of modern industry is to specialize, and that that specialization instead of making expert mechanics tends to develop a man in a single, narrow channel where he is only made familiar with a small part of the work required to finish the product of the industry in which he is engaged. The result is that there may be a decreasing amount of mechanical skill and general knowledge of the trade developing in our country. I think we are warranted in saying at least that there is no increase in the degree of mechanical skill among the boys who are now learning the trade in the various industries."

Some educators have noticed this tendency, and a large number of employers have also noticed the same tendency, and they have endeavored to establish schools where boys will be taught a specialty in the trade, where they will be prepared on two or three months' or a year's training to take the place of mechanics and make it more difficult for us to win strikes or to maintain our organizations. I think we might as well face the fact that the present system of education, so far as training a boy or girl to be self-supporting in the industries, is faulty and that we require a revolution in some of the methods. I believe our movement is the one that must set that revolution on foot and make the change that is absolutely essential. We take the boy and girl now with a little smattering of knowledge from the schoolroom and throw them into the industries; we separate them in one day from the schoolroom and place them in the factory. Some of our good friends have suggested that the boy and girl, after working all day in the factory or mill, might go to a night school to get some added knowledge they require to make them more proficient to earn a livelihood in their industries. In one country the question, while not solved, at least is solving itself. They have the continuation schools, and, instead of taking the young man and woman out of a school and throwing them into the industry for all time, they say there shall be a graduation of that school period. They take the young person and for the first six months or the first year of their employment in factory or mill force the employer to allow that individual during work hours to go to school to secure an education that will allow him to better hold his own in the industry in which he is engaged.

I believe what we need to-day is to adopt some emphatic declaration in favor of a continuation-school system that will say to the employer, "You can not take the child from the common school or even from the high school and force him to work the regular working hours of your establishment. That child must go to a continuation school, where he will be taught the theory and taught something of the practice of the industry he is engaged in."

There is one danger we have in the industrial form of education we have in this country to-day, and that is that it is subsidized very largely by those who are antagonistic to our movement; and, while carried on by private parties, they hope to put it in the mildest form, where it will work out to their benefit without conferring the kind of education we think is necessary for wageworkers. I think we should commit ourselves definitely in favor of a vocational education that will be entirely under the charge of the public-school system, where our children will be able after leaving schools to have an opportunity to learn something about the theory of industry in which they are engaged and where, gradually tapering off for three or four years, they will have an opportunity to be educated in the public schools and prepare themselves for the vocation they will follow in this life.

Delegate Simpson, in discussing the question, said in part: The previous speaker referred to continuation schools. I think the organized workers interested in the work of the American Federation of Labor should also be acquainted with the methods that are being adopted in other countries along this practical line. Little has been said about a system of continuation schools that will meet with the approval of organized labor. There are two systems of continuation schools in Germany. In Berlin there is a system of continuation schools which permits of the boys going to this school up to 7 o'clock at night, the employers being compelled to send the apprentices to those schools up to that hour. In Munich the law is somewhat better and, I think, would meet more with the approval of organized labor. If a boy works from 8 o'clock in the morning till 5 o'clock at night he is compelled to attend school during those hours, and the employer is compelled to pay the boy's wages during those hours. I contend that between the two systems the letter is far preferable in the interest of organized labor and should be supported if there is going to be an establishment of the continuation schools.

I think the suggestion of the previous speaker is an excellent one, because you will find, if you go through the schools of the United States, both the eastern and western parts, that the continuation school as instituted in Germany has not been developed in this country to any great extent, and it should be the duty of the employer to pay the apprentice after he has gone into the factory and is a producer and an important factor in that industry. The employer should pay him during the time he is in school, because it is to the benefit of the employer that the boy shall be made a more efficient worker by going to those schools.

Delegate Simpson discussed at length the question of technical education and described the evolution of the skilled trades where formerly work was done by hand and is now being done by machinery.

The motion to adopt the report of the committee was carried.

Mr. PAGE. The Southern Commercial Congress has taken pains to place itself on record as in favor of the Page bill. That is one of the great organizations of this country so far as the uplift of the South is concerned; and, without reading it, I will simply say that the letter indorses the Page bill, and ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

The letter referred to is as follows:

THE SOUTHERN COMMERCIAL CONGRESS,
Washington, D. C., December 14, 1912.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have before me a letter of December 11 from Mr. H. H. Gross, president of the National Soil Fertility League, of Chicago, Ill., to yourself and other Senators. Mr. Gross says:

"We are in accord—with the Page bill—except upon two points—one is expediency and the other relates to a feature of the bill."

In the matter of expediency Mr. Gross says:

"The main sections deal with youth, schools, and education."

"The other branch of the bill deals with extension work, teaching the adult farmer behind the plow. This feature is necessary to complete and make effective what was contemplated when the land-grant colleges were established a half century ago. This follows precedent, and completes a plan to which the Federal Government has been committed for 50 years."

This quotation very clearly shows the narrowness of the National Soil Fertility League in urging the Lever-Smith bill and opposing the Page bill. Will that measure complete and make effective what was contemplated when the land-grant colleges were established half a century ago? Does it complete the idea of vocational education to simply provide extension teaching and demonstration farming to "adult farmers behind the plow"?

Mr. Gross clearly implies that it is not necessary to complete the land-grant act of 1862 to provide extension work, such as night schools and continuation schools for adult workmen in the trades and industries. He practically says that the land-grant act is completed by taking care of the adult farmer, even though nothing is done for the adult farmer's wife, nor for the wife of the adult worker in the trades and industries. Mr. Gross further assumes that the farm boy who is to be the producer of cheaper foods, the farm home maker who is to manage the work of raising strong farm youth, the workers in the trades and industries who are to economically produce and transport our foreign and domestic manufactured products, the home makers in the trades and industries who are to have charge of raising the children of the people who work in the shop, in the transportation company, in merchandising, and in other nonagricultural lines. It is fortunate for the Senate and for the country thus to have set forth at this opportune time the narrow views of Mr. Gross and his confrères, some of whom are in our State agricultural colleges and in our State engineering colleges.

This astonishing letter further says:

"The vocational education branch of the bill breaks new ground and inaugurates a new system of education. If the bill were divided on the natural line of cleavage the legislation required would be more simple and administration less complex. It would strengthen the bill. We think this should be done."

When the land-grant act of 1862 was passed there had been no definite separation between high school and collegiate courses. The founders of the bill, as shown by their discussions on the floors of Congress, had no intention of making a "line of cleavage" which would cause practically all the funds of agricultural colleges to be used in what are now collegiate courses, with a four-year high-school course separating them from the common schools of the open country and the elementary schools of the cities and towns.

The State agricultural and mechanical colleges have made "the line of cleavage" by confining their work to the preparation of technicians, thus forgetting the farm boy and girl who are to return to the farm and the boy and girl in the city who are not to attend college; that 90 per cent who are to do the productive work and the home making of our country. This unnatural cleavage made by our State colleges of agriculture and mechanic arts shows how thoroughly these colleges have failed to interest themselves in classes which the land-grant act of 1862 was intended to reach.

To show the unfortunate attitude of the colleges and universities, attention is called to the use they have made of the Nelson fund, provided by Congress in the Nelson amendment passed in 1907. The Nelson amendment gives to each State college $25,000 a year from the Federal Treasury, and Congress indicated the purpose for which this money was to be used in the following language:

"That State colleges may use a portion of this money for providing courses for the special preparation of instructors for teaching the elements of agriculture and the mechanic arts."

No one has questioned the fact that Congress intended this fund of $1,200,000 annually, of which $4,000,000 has been already spent, to be used by the agricultural and mechanical colleges to meet the everywhere crying need for teachers prepared to teach agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics.

Commissioner of Education Claxton, a year ago in a public hearing held under the auspices of the Southern Commercial Congress, said that these colleges are using very little of this money in the preparation of instructors for teaching the elements of agriculture and the mechanic arts in the lower schools. It is a fair estimate to say that they are using far below 20 per cent of this money for that purpose, and this in spite of the fact that in many States consolidated rural schools are crying for teachers of agriculture and home economics and find it necessary to utilize teachers from the small denominational schools and from normal schools who have no adequate preparation in either agriculture or home economics. In other words, these colleges are at once neglecting their greatest opportunity and practically disregarding the clearly expressed wish of Congress, the hand that feeds them.

Even a worse condition exists in relation to the mechanical colleges of these State colleges and universities than in the case of the agricultural colleges. Almost none of them have even discussed the matter of preparing teachers under the Nelson amendment for trade schools. And comparatively few of these great institutions, liberally financed by public funds from the Federal and States Treasuries, have done anything at preparing teachers in home economics for the schools either of city or country. This "line of cleavage" between the farm boy and the technician has been carried so far as to be so ridiculous that it is pitiful.

It is admitted that the Lever-Smith bill would provide legislation more simple Some of the administrators of agricultural-college funds are not hunting for complex language that will say "shall" instead of "may" in appropriations from Congress. They would like to continue the "line of cleavage" which would prepare only college graduates, comparatively few of whom enter the ranks of the producing classes. Nothing could more clearly state the fact that the State colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts are not leading in taking the new science and technique of agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics down to the people through our otherwise wonderfully developed secondary school system than their use of the Nelson fund. They are campus colleges. They are not State colleges. They are colleges to prepare the aristocratic few. The Nelson fund was designed to make of them colleges to prepare vocational teachers for the secondary schools and thus provide technical instruction to all classes and make successful all the people, as well as the few who attend college.

It is disingenuous for Mr. Gross to say that separation would strengthen the bill, forgetting the farmer's wife, the laboring man, the laboring man's wife, the boy who is to be a farmer, the girl who is to be a farmer's wife, the boy who is to work in the trades and industries, and the girl who is to be the wife of the man who works in the trades and industries.

There has been strong feeling on the part of the leaders of the several tens of millions of people who favor the Page bill, that Mr. Gross and a relatively small number of his supporters throughout are using the Lever-Smith bill to destroy the Page bill. The terms of Mr. Gross's letter, when widely published, will confirm that belief.

THE IMPRACTICAL FEATURE.

Mr. Gross says:

"The one main reason why we can not support the Page bill is that provision calling for district agricultural high schools of secondary grade with branch experiment stations."

Mr. Gross here so thoroughly discloses his ignorance concerning the appropriation for agricultural high schools in the Page bill that ridicule rather than argument would be the normal way of replying to his letter.

He says, truly:

"Such schools will necessarily be from 40 to 75 miles apart." He says, also: "Not over 5 per cent of the farm youth could attend these and live at home." He also says: "The safety of the individual requires home life and influences between the ages of 13 and 17 years. To attend such schools the vast majority would have to be provided for in dormitories on the school premises. The colonization of several hundred boys and girls of that age would involve a moral hazard few parents would assume. * * * To us the objection is insuperable and would present an anomaly to the State and Federal Government building a school that really would serve but a township. Again, the attendance of these schools would involve an expense that many farmers would not meet. Many of the youth are required night and morning to do the chores and help maintain the farm activities. If the money contemplated (and the amount should be increased tenfold) were used to aid in the consolidation of the rural schools into the township unit, it would be of priceless benefit to the country boy and girl, and give them real help in gaining an education that they desire and ought to have, and which the State and Government should undertake to furnish."

In the first place, the Page bill recognizes that we are to have consolidated rural schools. It recognizes the fact that the 2,500 successful experiments with no failures in consolidating six or eight one-room schools into four to seven room schools may be taken as absolute evidence, from a business point of view, that our one-room schools are to be generally consolidated. This means that all farm pupils will be given agriculture and home economics along with their general school studies from the ages of 13 to 16 years. If it means anything, it means that the State colleges of agriculture and supplementary schools throughout, including State normal schools and State agricultural high schools, will finally be led to prepare a sufficient number of teachers to place at least one teacher of agriculture and one teacher of home economics in each consolidated rural school. This will require between forty and fifty thousand teachers of agriculture and as many teachers of home economics.

The Page bill does not contemplate that the 10 more or less agricultural high schools in each State will do the work of the consolidated rural school but will be a step higher, and will, for the most part, confine themselves to the last two years of high-school work. These schools will take the graduates of the consolidated rural school at about the end of the tenth school year, which is the middle of the high-school course, and will, under a faculty of technical teachers in agriculture and home economics and of general teachers in the ordinary high-school subjects, give a course which will further fit them for the management of farms and farm homes, and will further train large numbers to become teachers of agriculture and home economics, and other subjects in the consolidated and other rural schools; and that the highly educational and inspirational courses of the best equipped of these schools do prepare country life leaders to return to their home communities has been proven in a dozen States.

Three or four hundred agricultural high schools distributed throughout the country will also standardize the agricultural and home economics instruction in rural and town schools. Without such standardizing influence, agriculture in our secondary school system will always be at ragged ends. With such standardization and leadership, country life education can be the most efficient and the most inspirational part of our public educational system.

Agricultural colleges have generally placed their entrance at the close of the high-school course, but in most States they have done almost nothing to make the agricultural high school practical for those who can not attend the college. Therefore the agricultural colleges are reaching in a vital way only a small part of 1 per cent of the men and women who become managers of farms and farm homes.

The consolidated rural and village schools, which are local, will care for all pupils of 13 to 17 years of age; the proposed agricultural high schools, which are not local, but are practically in each congressional district, will take some of those pupils through the next step in their education when they are 17 to 20 years of age, thus rounding out both their high-school course and their vocational training to manage the farm and the farm home.

Illustrating the absurdity of Mr. Gross's statements is the fact that already the agricultural high schools of Minnesota have established a minimum age limit of 17 years.

The quotation from Assistant State Superintendent Phillips, of Minnesota, quoted in Mr. Gross's letter, could not have applied to the original agricultural high school at St. Anthony Park, to the agricultural high school at Morris, nor to the agricultural high school at Crookston, Minn., because the ages given by Mr. Gross do not apply to those schools. Minnesota has this year established 50 consolidated rural schools, and is rapidly placing agriculture in the village and town schools, but it has no notion of doing away with its three agricultural high schools with their twelve to fifteen hundred students for the last half of the high-school course. Minnesota's plan is to have one teacher of agriculture and one teacher of home economics in every rural school, either in a consolidated rural school in the open country or in a village or city school to which the farm youth of the surrounding country are hauled at public expense. Mr. Gross's quotation does not fit into the Minnesota conditions and can hardly have been used for his purpose with the knowledge and consent of Mr. Phillips.

Agricultural high schools such as that at St. Anthony Park, Minn., with its nearly 1,000 students, have young farm people from 17 to 25 years of age, who prove to be more earnest, more moral, than the average students in the universities and colleges of this country, and the blow struck by the National Soil Fertility League at coeducation in State agricultural high schools will naturally be resented by the schools of the entire country.

Mr. Gross says that an agricultural high school would serve but a township. Each of the agricultural high schools of Alabama, Georgia, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Minnesota, and other States serves a congressional district or larger area. Their students come not from local homes, but are more thoroughly distributed throughout all the counties of the State than are the students of the State colleges and universities which get their students largely from the cities, while the agricultural high schools get their students from the rural schools. In failing to differentiate between the consolidated rural school and the agricultural high school, Mr. Gross places himself in the position of such dense ignorance that his advice regarding separating the bill becomes impotent and he places his supporters in a most unenviable light.

The Page bill contemplates the expenditure of $3,000,000 by the Federal Government and $3,000,000 by the State governments for agricultural high schools. Mr. Gross says this should be increased tenfold to accommodate all the consolidated rural schools. This is equivalent to requesting that Congress appropriate $30,000,000 and require the States to appropriate an equal amount, devoting $60,000,000 to vocational education for farm boys and girls in their home rural-school districts. This would provide $1,500 for each 40,000 consolidated and village rural schools for the teaching of agriculture and home economics. Senator PAGE nor any of his associates have thought of suggesting anything so radical. The Page bill proposes to bring the work of the agricultural and mechanical colleges down nearer to the people who manage our farms, our farm homes, and who work in the trades and industries and manage the homes of our industrial workers by producing local leaders and teachers for the rural schools and county demonstration farm workers. It leaves the financing of the local schools to the States and communities. Mr. Gross has shown that the Page bill is really a conservative measure.

The Lever-Smith bill, on the other hand, fails to recognize that already the Federal Government and the States have farm-efficiency men in more than one-third of the counties of the United States. Nearly all counties in the Southern States, under the leadership of Dr. Knapp, are thus supplied in part with Federal, in part with State, and in part with private and local, funds. The Federal Government, the State governments, and private and local organizations are rapidly extending this work into the Northern States. Both the Page bill and the Lever bill propose to extend this work to all counties and to systematize and standardize it; but to say that this minor matter, which is largely working itself out, completes the land-grant act of 1862 is, in the face of the above-stated facts, absurd, to say the least.

The Page bill, by providing some hundreds of agricultural high schools in the country by providing some hundreds of trade schools in the large centers of population, by providing vocational courses of study in the general run of secondary or high schools of the country, by providing for college extension, and then by providing that in the State colleges of agriculture and State normal schools teachers shall be trained for these lines of work, proposes a system which really does supplement and look to thoroughly completing the purpose of the land-grant act of 1862.

That the proposed branch experiment stations are needed is shown by the fact that the United States Department of Agriculture and the State experiment stations are establishing branch stations of this kind in many States. Under the Page bill these branch stations would be systematically placed beside the agricultural high schools, where, besides serving as investigational farms, they would have an immediate educational value to the students as well as a general educational value to the farmers of the agricultural regions in which these schools are placed.

The Page bill has been wrought out by men best acquainted with vocational education in this country. The Gross letter shows that his propaganda for the Lever-Smith bill is in the hands of men who do not know concerning agricultural high schools, trade schools, agriculture, trades and industries, and home economics in the public schools, and who do not know or appreciate the need of preparing teachers for these schools and for extension work.

Very sincerely, yours,

CLARENCE J. OWENS,
Managing Director Southern Commercial Congress.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, something has been said here about the right of the Federal Government to enter upon the secondary educational work of the country. I received a very interesting communication recently on the constitutional features of this bill. The communication is from an attorney who was formerly Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Hon. Frank Warren Hackett. I will only read one paragraph, and will ask that the entire article may be printed, if there is no objection.

The paragraph referred to is as follows:

The grand object of this bill, as we have seen, is to render aid in furnishing vocational education to the American boy and girl. Here a question of the power of Congress involves something more than an examination into what has heretofore been done by Federal authority to help along the cause of education in general. An underlying purpose is to check the growing evil that is threatening the well-being of the body politic. There is, and for some time has been, disquietude in the field of labor. No longer is it prudent to allow a great majority of the boys and girls of the land to grow up without early training in the art of earning a livelihood. Something better must be furnished than an ordinary school training. It is the part of wisdom to heed betimes the warning, and diligently to seek and apply the remedy.

He treats the matter from the standpoint of constitutional rights, and I ask that his article may be inserted in full in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

IS THE PAGE VOCATIONAL EDUCATION BILL CONSTITUTIONAL?

The Page bill now pending in the Senate proposes to appropriate nearly $15,000,000 annually, beginning in 1916, in order to cooperate with the States in encouraging instruction in agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics in secondary schools; in maintaining instruction in these vocational subjects in State normal schools; and in maintaining extension departments in State colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts. It has been carefully drawn, after consultation with our leading educators. The plan it embodies appears eminently practical. It is sensible and businesslike. The bill has earnest supporters in every part of the country.

A leading purpose is to encourage a State to appropriate a reasonable sum of money for teaching boys how to succeed in industrial pursuits, and to instruct the girl likewise for such occupation as may be suited to her as well as to educate her in what is styled "home economics." A sum is offered to the State, according to the amount that the local community shall have raised for the purpose. The State will appropriate an amount equal to the Federal appropriation, and the local community is expected to contribute as much as the State and Federal appropriation combined. This method is a judicious one, and the expenditure of the fund is well safeguarded.

The moving cause of this most important enterprise is found in the conditions that confront the great majority of our American boys just as they are leaving the public school. What they have been taught there, however valuable for some purposes, has not had the direct effect of fitting them to earn a living. Many of these boys, losing a chance to become useful citizens, fail in obtaining regular employment, while some of them, sad to say, degenerate into the criminal class.

Says an observer interested in the welfare of young men: "Our reformatories and jails are still filled with mere boys." The period is that where the boy's nature is impressionable; his aspirations are awakened, and he deserves to have a fair opportunity presented where he can follow his bent. What he has been compelled to apply himself to at school has not been much to his liking. He looks around him, and he feels that he does not have a chance to make a man of himself. Not a little of the unrest existing to-day among workingmen is to be traced to a conviction on the part of a father that somehow his children are not getting fair treatment. While not a subject for recrimination, it is a source of danger that every good citizen must stop and think about. What a recent writer says is unhappily true: "Too many boys are being turned loose in the world to live in a makeshift way."

This deplorable state of things, which has been going on from bad to worse, brings a duty home to the legislator. In all seriousness, it must be admitted that action should be taken, and that speedily, to meet and correct this growing evil. It is not too much to say that, aggravated as it is by the character of the immigration of recent years, the situation constitutes a menace to the peace and safety of the State. It is not simply a check to prosperity, it is a peril to our institutions.

What can be done to help these boys that will make of them good citizens and thereby conserve law and order? The Page bill endeavors to answer this question.

While this inquiry presses upon our attention, we find ourselves face to face with another factor in our national life hardly less disturbing. The country has come to realize the truth that much of our soil has been overworked, its fertility exhausted, and that we must work hard to restore to it, if we can, it former productivity. Already the Department of Agriculture has done praiseworthy work in the direction of enabling the farmer to raise heavier crops. To the Morrill Act of 1862 and to the Hatch Act of 1887 is due the gratitude of the entire country for fine and efficient service rendered by the agricultural college. Much remains to be accomplished in order to bring home to the tiller of the soil a knowledge of scientific farming. It is here that the Page bill seeks to benefit the people in every part of the country. Experimental farms are projected where practical work will be done by the students with a result that the adult farmer will profit by what has been demonstrated, after research and experiment, in some instances not far from his home. When we reflect that in 1907 Germany, as compared with the United States, in less than one-half the area, harvested nearly double the bushels of wheat, oats, barley, rye, and potatoes, we need not be told that it would be folly in us not to bestow our best thought upon the problems of our future food supply.

The Page bill would improve our farming, and by making it more profitable would attract our boys by interesting them in the science of crop raising, thus checking the tendency to desert the healthful surroundings of rural life in order to crowd into the cities. Farm life would have a new meaning. The legislation in view would rescue land from wasteful treatment and bring it under the influence of men eager to cultivate it by the best methods, because they are widening their knowledge of how to make their possessions more and more productive.

Enough has been said to indicate that this measure contemplates the attainment of objects of vital interest and of almost incalculable value to every community in the land. The thought naturally occurs, Is an appropriation of money for such purposes as these within the power of Congress? Is the Page bill constitutional?

Were this question the first of its kind, the reply that most lawyers would make offhand, it is likely, would offer no contradiction to the views expressed by President Buchanan in his message of February 24, 1859, vetoing a bill for giving public lands to the States to establish agricultural colleges: "I presume the general proposition is undeniable that Congress does not possess the power to appropriate money in the Treasury raised by taxes on the people of the United States for the purpose of educating the people of the respective States."

Yet three years later Abraham Lincoln signed the bill and it became a law, bearing the honored name of "the Morrill Act." One ground upon which its constitutionality was vested was that Congress had power to dispose of the public lands. In January, 1887, when a bill to establish agricultural experiment stations was under debate in the Senate, an amendment was adopted adding after the words "money in the Treasury" the further words "proceeding from the sales of public lands," although the Senator in charge of the bill remarked in accepting the amendment that he thought it unnecessary. During the debate Senator Vest said: "We have established a Bureau of Agriculture. It is very questionable whether the power to do that exists or not. Some of the best lawyers in the United States doubted it when established and doubt it to-day, but it was done and that bureau is now in existence." Senator Butler expressed a like doubt, but added: "It has been acquiesced in so long as to have become an acknowledged and accomplished fact."

The Department of Agriculture, it must be admitted, exists under no express grant of power to Congress, but only because that body, in obedience to public sentiment, found a power to create and maintain it in the "general-welfare" clause of the Constitution. The Bureau of Education, worth to the country many times over what it has cost, can refer its existence to the same clause. So of other forms of expenditure by Congress that have responded to public needs in contributing to the general welfare.

This section of the Constitution (Art. I, sec. 8) begins as follows:

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States * * *."

In the earlier days it was generally understood that these words "provide for * * * the general welfare" would not support an appropriation of money to carry out a purpose other than is to be discerned in the language of the enumerated powers conferred upon Congress. A strict constructionist may hold to this doctrine at the present time. But the growth of the country, the change in its needs, and the imperative demand for the means to carry into effect what it is the obvious duty of the National Government to accomplish sustains Congress in appropriating money, for the benefit of the entire people, for objects not embraced within the language of the enumerated powers. Where the Nation requires action to be taken for its safety or its welfare, in a sense that everyone must experience the advantage of the protection and help afforded, Congress has demonstrated that it has felt itself justified in voting an appropriation therefor.

The furtherance of agriculture, the preservation of forests, the conduct of mining are some of the purposes which have induced Congress to take upon itself the responsibility of appropriating money under the "general-welfare" clause. This action has been followed apparently by no successful attempt to set aside the law for lack of constitutional power, and it may be inferred that the people are willing to trust Congress and the President that the limits of a wise discretion are not transgressed.

So far as the bill under consideration, therefore, proposes that money be appropriated for teaching the elements of agriculture, it is apprehended that no serious objection will be advanced on the score of a lack of power in Congress under the Constitution to vote money for such a purpose. The policy of making annual appropriations of this character has now become firmly fixed, and a further discussion here of constitutional power in regard to it would be merely academic.

The grand object of this bill, as we have seen, is to render aid in furnishing vocational education to the American boy and girl. Here a question of the power of Congress involves something more than an examination into what has heretofore been done by Federal authority to help along the cause of education in general. An underlying purpose is to check a growing evil that is threatening the well-being of the body politic. There is and for some time has been disquietude in the field of labor. No longer is it prudent to allow a great majority of the boys and girls of the land to grow up without early training in the art of earning a livelihood. Something better must be furnished than an ordinary school training. It is the part of wisdom to heed betimes the warning and diligently to seek and apply the remedy.

Well it has been said in an editorial upon the subject of this bill:

"Battleships and standing armies are not the only means of protection for a nation. Danger from a foreign foe is a remote possibility. Danger from ignorance, inefficiency, and poverty is an ever-present peril."

A like thought is conveyed in the following extract from Senator PAGE'S speech in advocacy of his bill:

"National defense is just as effectually provided for in promoting good citizenship as in building battleships. An illiterate, uneducated citizen, disloyal and anarchistic, as he oftentimes is, is a greater menace to our safety than the combined battleships of Great Britain, France, and Germany."

These expressions, uttered in all sincerity, points the way unwittingly to the real power that exists in Congress to put this proposed enactment upon the statute books. One need not resort to the "general-welfare" clause, though the measure is entitled to the protection and encouragement which these words afford. Its constitutionality may securely be vested on another ground, and that is the power conferred upon Congress to provide for "the common defense."

These words, "the common defense," are found in the preamble of the Constitution. They occur also in the Articles of Confederation. Our forefathers had them ever in mind. They but expressed that instinct of self-preservation which governs every organized society. Of course they are entitled to be liberally construed. The framers of the Constitution doubtless had chiefly in view the dangers to be apprehended from a foreign enemy, but they employed the term in no restrictive sense. Domestic enemies are not omitted from the reckoning. Congress, as we would naturally expect, is authorized to resort to every measure that in its judgment is needful and proper to insure the safety of a common country.

There is no call for argument. It surely will not be denied that the people, through their Congress, can seasonably guard against dangers that threaten the fabric of Government. If the peace and happiness of the country demand that a larger and a better opportunity of education be given to the boy or the girl before going out into the world, Congress will not hesitate from any lack of power to provide for the "common defense" of our institutions by hastening forward this salutary legislation.

Another consideration is not altogether without merit, and that is the attitude of the several States themselves toward this proposed extension of aid. So fair and so strong is the inducement we may with reason assume that every State in the Union will join in the work of putting into successful operation this admirably conceived plan for strengthening and elevating the American people. As State after State falls into line, what in the sequel will have become of any fancied objections that State rights have been invaded or that Congress, in holding out a helping hand to the State, had entered a field which the Constitution had not authorized it to occupy?

FRANK WARREN HACKETT.

JULY 26, 1912.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I presume that before this discussion is concluded there may be a good many interrogatories which I may be called upon to answer. I simply wish to say that, having discussed this matter at considerable length on a previous occasion, I am now inclined to let other Senators continue the discussion, although I should be very glad to answer any question or correct any wrong impression regarding the bill.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I have a brief letter from a very distinguished educator in regard to this bill which states better than I myself can state some questions I should like to have answered. I will ask to have the letter read from the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read as requested.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

THE CARNEGIE FOUNDATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF TEACHING,
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
New York, January 26, 1913.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR ROOT: I venture to call your attention to what seems to me very serious objections to the Page bill now before the Senate, which contemplates a large appropriation by Congress for the support of vocational education in the secondary schools of the various States.

This bill seems to me unwise both from the standpoint of public policy and from that of education.

Here for the first time Congress undertakes to appropriate money for secondary schools. If Congress is to enter upon this policy it should be only after a fair discussion of the whole question. It is difficult to see where Congress is to stop if it is to begin the practice of appropriation to local State agencies. There is no enterprise of the local or State government which may not with equal justice ask for a grant from the National Treasury. One does not need to be a State rights man in the party sense to appreciate that this is a most far-reaching change in our fundamental policy and one to be entered upon only after thorough understanding of what it means. Elementary schools, mining schools, hospitals, schools for defectives, or any charitable or educational agency are within the scope of such legislation. All sorts of paternalistic possibilities are here included.

Educationally the measure seems to me of very doubtful wisdom. It provides for a system of education without adequate educational supervision. In order to secure some sort of educational control vocational schools are brought by this bill under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, and elaborate requirements for expenditure and courses of study and even of personnel are included. No such centralization of educational power has ever before been attempted. Secondary education would practically be directed by the Secretary of the Interior. It is possible that the Secretary of the Interior would exercise this authority wisely; it may be that he would direct the secondary schools of the various States better than the States themselves; but it is certainly open to question whether the natural, systematic development of their own school systems by the various States is not a wiser thing. In order to secure an appropriation from the General Government the States are here asked not only to accept a very large degree of direction in the matter of secondary and vocational education but the plan of education proposed has little or no relation to the present State school systems, and seems more likely to produce educational confusion than educational order. The experience of the Morrill Act shows that money expended without educational planning may be made to do harm as well as good. The effort in this bill to compel the States accepting the money to do wisely in its expenditure goes to the other extreme, but it contains no greater assurance of wise educational oversight than did the Morrill bill, after which it is patterned. The questions involved both in public policy and in education seem too important to be settled in the hurry of a short session.

I am,
Very sincerely, yours, HENRY S. PRITCHETT.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I am well aware that a few States—notably Massachusetts and New York—have taken the attitude of Dr. Pritchett in his letter written to the senior Senator from New York. The strong objection, it seems to me, of Dr. Pritchett is that contained in the following words:

It provides for a system of education without adequate educational supervision. In order to secure some sort of educational control vocational schools are brought by this bill under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, and elaborate requirements of expenditure and courses of study and even of personnel are included. No such centralization of educational power has ever before been attempted. Secondary education would practically be directed by the Secretary of the Interior. It is possible that the Secretary of the Interior would exercise this authority wisely; it may be that he would direct the secondary schools of the various States better than the States themselves, but it is certainly open to question whether the natural systematic development of their own school systems by the various States is not a wiser thing.

From the first I have realized that this was a most serious objection to the Page bill as originally drawn, and I addressed myself to the task of so revising the original bill as to eliminate as far as possible this objection.

One of the leading friends of the Page bill is a Representative in Congress from the city of New York, Hon. WILLIAM C. REDFIELD. He is, as is well known, the president of the National Society for the Promotion of Industrial Education. We were early in conference as to these objectionable features of the Page bill, but we were both anxious to construct the best possible measure, and, after repeated conferences, we reached what we thought was a fair solution of this problem; and he brought back word from New York that the rewritten bill as it now appears in the amendment which I have offered to the Lever bill was generally satisfactory to the educators of his State.

The valuable aid of Dr. Snedden, head of the educational system of Massachusetts, was secured in the effort to so rewrite the Page bill as to eliminate the objection of Dr. Pritchett and others who felt as he did. The result, was, let me repeat, that after a good deal of painstaking labor the Page bill was so reconstructed as to these objectionable features as to secure the warm approval of both New York and Massachusetts. Dr. Snedden was so delighted with the rewritten bill that he sent me a telegram, in which he said:

I hope the bill as now drawn may pass without the change of a single line.

Mr. President, I would like to call the attention of the Senator from New York to a statement made by the chief magistrate of the New York municipal court, Judge William McAdoo, in his annual report. He says:

There is growing up in this city a menacing army of boys and young men who are the most troublesome element the authorities have to deal with. From the ranks of these lawless, reckless rowdies, who are organized in bands or bound up with chums or pals, come most of the crop of burglars, truck thieves, holdup men, and other criminals and dangerous characters.

Another New York City judge, Judge Merritt W. Pinckney, of the New York juvenile court, says that apparent neglect and incompetence are responsible for most of the delinquency which brought to his court three-fifths of the 12,000 children who have passed through it during his incumbency of that office.

Prof. George Walter Fiske, in his series of lectures on "Boy life and self-government," makes the following significant statement:

Our reformatories and jails are still filled with mere boys. The maximal age for malicious mischief is only 14; for petty larceny and assault, 15; for crimes against property, 16; while the maximum curve for fornication is at 17. Early and middle adolescence is still the great crime period. The shirking of the average home largely accounts for this boy waste, but the ethical failure of the public school is, to a degree, responsible also.

Mr. President, by the college extension features of Senate bill No. 3, which are exactly the same as the provisions of the Lever bill, we are appropriating $3,480,000 for the benefit of the adult farmer on the farm. In my judgment, the time has arrived when we should reach down and take the hands of the neglected boys who, in far too large numbers, are being turned adrift, and are to-day—to use the language of Judge McAdoo—"developing into a crop of burglars, truck thieves, holdup men, and other criminals and dangerous characters."

Mr. President, out of our unparalleled prosperity and our great wealth we must do something for the sons of our laboring men. That New York, the great Empire State, has lamentably failed in this particular is shown by the statements of Judges McAdoo and Pinckney, and I presume other States are equally guilty of wrong in this particular.

If the States will not act in the matter, we must do so, because without some change for the better in this regard we can not have good citizenship.

I believe that the boys now growing up must have a different kind of education from that which they are now receiving, or we are going to produce in the next generation a race of anarchists; and if the States themselves will not do this work, it seems to me that we ought to go ahead and blaze the trail, pointing the way whereby it may be done, not by a single State, but under one great plan of cooperation between the several States and the Federal Government.

I know that away back in 1856 the constitutional question was raised. James Buchanan vetoed the first Morrill agricultural college bill, but the Congress of 1862 again passed that bill, and to-day, in speaking of Abraham Lincoln, we often say that his first and greatest act was the liberating of 4,000,000 slaves, and second to it only, was his signing of the Morrill agricultural college act. No one to-day would think of repealing that law. But, more than this, in 1887, we passed the Hatch Act; a little later the Adams Act; in 1907 we passed what is known as the Nelson amendment; and from time to time we have established repeated precedents for granting Federal aid to education.

I am not a lawyer and do not care to discuss constitutional questions. I only know that something must be done or, in my judgment, we are going to raise up, in the next decade, a race of very undesirable citizens.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have in my hand the amendment offered January 24, 1913, as a substitute for the so-called Lever bill. I notice that section 16 reads as follows:

SEC. 16. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby charged with the duty, and to him is hereby given all necessary power, to administer the provisions of this act relating to the rural-school fund, the industrial-school fund, the agricultural high-school fund, the college teachers' training fund, and the teachers' training fund, to secure advice and assistance from the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor in carrying out the provisions of this act, in the making of investigations concerning education in the industries, home economics, and agriculture, and in the making of reports thereon; to cooperate with the State boards of vocational education herein provided for the respective States and the District of Columbia in developing the work of schools and in the training of teachers benefited by this act; and to give to such boards for vocational education such advice and assistance as will best enable them to carry out the provisions of this act.

I also notice in section 22 a statement almost similar, but I believe going a little further, for it provides:

SEC. 22. That in order to secure the benefit of the rural-school fund, the agricultural-school fund, the college teachers' training fund, or the teachers' training fund, the board for vocational education for each State and the District of Columbia shall adopt, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and place in operation a general administrative scheme or plan, with such modifications as may be made from time to time, for the proper distribution of moneys to schools and colleges as herein provided; for the inspection and approval of such schools and colleges under the provisions of this act.

Do I understand, under this bill, that the Secretary of the Interior, through the advice and the assistance of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, is given the power to administer the provisions of the act relating to the distribution of the appropriations and to prescribe the instruction which may be given in a State which participates in the fund? Is that what it means?

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will read the bill through he will find that it has been changed from the form of the original bill for the express purpose of meeting the ideas which he now advances; in other words, it provides that the suggestions of the Secretary of the Interior shall not be mandatory. On the contrary, the board for vocational education shall formulate the plans for the school work under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is a State board.

Mr. PAGE. Yes; the State board for vocational education. I do not know, Mr. President, that I can answer the Senator from Utah any better than by saying that for a year a fight has been on to protect the autonomy of the States. It has come from various quarters, notably from New York and from Massachusetts. One of the commissioners of education from Massachusetts came here to Washington and stayed two weeks to assist in getting this bill into such shape that it would meet the views of those States which insisted that the autonomy of the States should not be materially disturbed. At the same time it was conceded that there should be thrown around these appropriations some measure of Federal supervision.

Mr. SMOOT. But, Mr. President, as I read section 16 it is not in the alternative. It is a direct power to them to cooperate with State boards for vocational education, and so forth.

Mr. PAGE. Will the Senator let me read a part of section 19?

Mr. SMOOT. Section 16 refers to all of the different school funds, and, it seems to me, is the section that would cover the point I am trying to reach, and that is this: If I read that section aright, it gives to the Secretary of the Interior power to administer the provisions of the act and virtually to control the expenditure of the money.

Mr. PAGE. Does the Senator understand that one section can be picked out and not read in connection with all the other sections of the measure?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not so understand, and I should be very glad to have the Senator read the section to which he refers.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to call attention to section 19:

SEC. 19. In order to secure the benefit of the secondary school department fund, the industrial or home economics school fund, the district agricultural school fund, the college teachers' training fund, or the normal teachers' training fund, the board for vocational education for each State and the District of Columbia shall adopt, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and place in operation a general administrative scheme or plan, with such modifications as may be made from time to time, for the proper distribution of moneys to schools of secondary grade and to colleges and normal schools as herein provided; for the inspection and approval of such schools and colleges under the provisions of this act.

Note that the board for vocational education adopts and places in operation the general administrative scheme or plan. The Secretary of the Interior can only approve the plan adopted by the State board for vocational education.

It is true that the Secretary of the Interior has a supervisory power, but it would be entirely contrary to the spirit of this bill for him to exercise other than a supervisory power.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, from what print of the amendment was the Senator reading? The one I have is different from the one he read.

Mr. PAGE. I read from the original bill. There has been no change in the text of the last 15 sections of the bill, although the sections are renumbered. It is number 16 in the amendment. I do not know from what section the Senator was reading.

Mr. SMOOT. Section 16 of the amended amendment was what I was reading from.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I simply wish to suggest that the provisions to which the Senator refers are those which touch these officials, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture; but nowhere in the bill, as I read it, is there imposed upon these officials the duty of controlling the distribution of any of these expenditures. The language used here relates to the provisions in the act with which they have to do.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I take it the wording of section 16, if the Senator will bear with me, refers particularly to a power that is conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior, for it states——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment, and then I will gladly yield. Section 16 provides:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby charged with the duty, and to him is hereby given all necessary power, to administer the provisions of this act relating to the rural-school fund—

And all the other funds. It seems to me that that is wide power given him.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the Senator object to having that power in the Secretary of the Interior to administer this act so far as its relation to the Federal Government is concerned?

Mr. SMOOT. No; but it goes further than that, Mr. President, as I have already called attention to, and as I was about to proceed to elaborate; but I yield to the Senator from Iowa, as I said I would.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah is of the opinion that this bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to distribute the fund among the teachers of the schools in each and every State, he has greatly, I think, misread it. The Secretary of the Interior administers it, in so far as it is necessary for him to determine whether the States shall have the money. If he determines that the particular State is entitled to the money, then it is paid over to the authorities of the State, to be distributed, I assume, in the ordinary way as a school fund. In the amendment that is now before us, as the Senator will see if he will turn to section 22, it becomes perfectly clear:

That in order to secure the benefit of the rural-school fund, the agricultural-school fund, the college teachers' training fund, or the teachers' training fund, the board of vocational education—

And that board must be organized in each State before it is entitled to any part of the appropriation—shall adopt, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and place in operation a general administrative scheme or plan, with such modifications as may be made from time to time, for the proper distribution of moneys to schools and colleges as herein provided.

Mr. SMOOT. Now go on.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the administrative feature of this bill, as far as these schools and colleges are concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not disagree with the Senator as far as that is concerned; but I will ask the Senator to proceed and read from that point on—from the word "provided," in line 9, page 17.

Mr. CUMMINS. The language is:

For the inspection and approval of such schools and colleges under the provisions of this act, and for the formulation and application in such inspection and approval of standards and requirements in vocational education as to types of schools, location, course of study, etc., qualifications of teachers, etc.

Undoubtedly, under the bill, each State, through its vocational board, must present a plan for the distribution of the money so far as vocational training is concerned, and that plan must be approved by the Secretary of the Interior. That is the general idea of the bill. But there, I think, the power and responsibility of the Secretary of the Interior end.

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me that it specifically states that the Secretary of the Interior will have the power to pass upon the question of the types of schools, the location of the schools, the course of study, the qualifications of the teachers, the methods of instruction, the conditions of admission, and the employment of pupils.

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly. That is the purpose of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I rather think that is a dangerous power to give to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the vocational board must make this plan and present it to the Secretary of the Interior, and if he approves it the State gets the money. If he disapproves it, the State does not get the money.

Mr. PAGE. The Senator from Utah has failed to read the whole bill. I will read it.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Senator reads further, I should like to ask him whether or not he agrees with the statement just made by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. PAGE. My attention was called away by my clerk and I did not hear the statement.

Mr. SMOOT. I will make the statement again. Does the Senator agree that under section 22 the Secretary of the Interior has the power to pass upon the qualifications of the teachers, the methods of instruction, the conditions of admission, and the employment of pupils?

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator from Utah does not put that as though it were a proposition to which I agree. It is the plan that is submitted to the Secretary of the Interior—not the detail of the qualifications of the teachers or the employment of pupils.

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me, Mr. President, that if the Secretary of the Interior has the power to reject the plan that must be approved before the money will be given to the State for this particular purpose, he has it in his power to say whether or not the State shall have any of the appropriation.

Mr. PAGE. That matter was taken up in our committee with a great deal of care; it was thrashed out very thoroughly; and we finally thought that we had put up the bars safely by this section.

Mr. SMOOT. What section is it?

Mr. PAGE. Section 30. I will read it:

If the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture, as herein provided, shall withhold a certificate from any State or the District of Columbia for the whole or any part of its allotment, the facts and reasons therefor shall be reported to the President, in order that the State or the District of Columbia may, if it shall so desire, appeal to Congress from the determination of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture. If the next Congress shall not direct such sum to be paid, it shall be covered into the Treasury.

That seemed to satisfy those who made objections to the bill substantially such as have been made by the Senator from Utah. I think it is a pretty good safeguard.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Vermont misunderstands the Senator from Utah. The Senator from Utah is objecting because the bars have been put up too effectually—not because they have not been put up sufficiently.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he means that this bill should leave to the discretion of the State authorities the use they should make of this fund, so that while they were receiving it for the purpose of providing some method of vocational education they might divert it to a use entirely different, and there should be no supervisory control left in the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture to prevent the misuse of the fund?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; that is not my position at all.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This language provides for the submission to the Secretary of a plan which must receive his approval before the money is turned over to the State authorities.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but it is not the plan that would be adopted by the president of the agricultural college, or the board of the agricultural college, or the board of the State. They say how the plan shall be formulated. It must conform to certain requirements before it will be approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. PAGE. That is it.

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me that that puts a power into their hands that is hardly justifiable. I think the Secretary of the Interior ought to have power to see that the money is expended for that particular purpose. But to extend that power to cover the form in which it shall be expended, as provided in section 22 of the proposed amendment, I think is going too far.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to read another section that was introduced here for the express purpose of preventing the Secretary of the Interior from making an arbitrary decision which is in conflict with the views of the State authorities.

Section 31 of the amendment reads:

That the moneys received by any State or the District of Columbia for any given purpose under the provisions of this act shall be used only for such purpose and shall be distributed among the institutions entitled to the benefit of such moneys in proportion to the amount which each expends out of other income derived from general or from local public funds for the same purpose during the same period.

Here is the modification:

Or such money shall be distributed on some other basis and according to some other plan previously adopted by the board for vocational education or by legislative authority for such State or the District of Columbia with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SMOOT. Why does not the Senator rest his whole amendment upon that provision rather than to have section 19 put in here, as it is, virtually in conflict with that?

Mr. PAGE. I think the two provisions will have to be taken together. We do not want to remove from the Federal Government some power of supervision. The States may bring forward any plan or scheme they see fit. It is true that the Federal Government, through the Secretary of the Interior, must supervise. But if the Secretary of the Interior withholds the money, the amendment gives Congress the final power to give it back, and it provides, beyond that, in about the strongest terms it can, that it shall be expended under the provisions of this act or under some other provision to be formulated by the board of vocational education. In fact, Mr. President, we have gone a little further than I thought we ought to go in trying to establish State autonomy. But that was the view of Massachusetts and of New York and of some of the other States, and I did not believe it would work out with any harm, so I consented to give the States this almost unlimited power to arrange the matter according to their own wishes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate for any length of time, but I want to make a few brief observations in regard to the Page amendment.

If any of the Senators here ever acted as a member of a local board of education and witnessed the graduating classes each year in the high schools and even in the grammar schools, whether in agricultural States or in States with great cities and congested population, he must have been impressed by the fact that only a small portion, indeed, of the children that flock to our public schools graduate from the high schools or the grammar schools, and that only an infinitesimal portion of them ever enter a college of higher education. He must have been impressed by the fact that often two-thirds and sometimes three-fourths of the graduating classes in the high schools are girls, and that the great army of boys from the families of moderate circumstance and from the homes of the poor leave these schools before they reach the age of 14 years. They are compelled to leave these schools by the demand that they go forth and seek employment to win bread for their families. It is even so in the villages in the agricultural States, and it is lamentably true in the great congested centers and the factory districts of this country. More and more, Mr. President, are we looking squarely into the face the question, "How are these people of the future to earn a living? How can we add to their efficiency and make them more capable of self-support and more useful citizens?"

We have not hesitated here in maintaining the great Agricultural Department to appropriate money from the United States Treasury to send men out into the fields in Georgia, in Mississippi, and elsewhere, and have them play the part of local educators, to tell men how to treat the soil and how to plant the seed and how to supervise the growth of products. We have not stopped because we feared we were extending Federal authority too far and extending Federal functions beyond the limits of the Constitution of the United States. We have not hesitated in taking steps to protect the health of our people, to pass pure-food laws and meat-inspection laws. We have been legislating for years indirectly to help great industries through protective tariffs and one thing and another, and here we face a question of humanity.

Not long ago I rode through one of the manufacturing districts. A gentleman and I were looking out of the train window down one of the streets, and he pointed to a row of "company houses," as he called them, on each side of the street as far as you could see. He said: "These people live in houses owned by the barons who own the manufacturing plants and pay rent to them and they are protected by law, and in the case of these families many a time the boys who grow up there feel that a few inches above their heads is a steel ceiling above which they can not rise."

These schools are to reach into fields like that and increase the efficiency of the coming race, and I believe in them with all my heart.

Every dollar appropriated here requires another dollar to meet it in the State and another dollar in the municipality. The inspiration to this great work will come from this law. We establish and support, through our States, great universities for higher education, schools for the law, medicine, and all that sort of thing, and help a very few of our people. We ought to do that. But here we are laying the foundation for reaching the boy who has before him the stern struggle of life. We are making him more fit.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understood the Senator to say that the bill required that for each dollar the National Government gave the State should give a dollar and the municipality a dollar.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That was the statement of the author of the measure here on Friday.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not see that anywhere in the amendment.

Mr. PAGE. If I may be allowed to explain, the bill provides that for every dollar furnished by the Federal Government two dollars more shall be contributed by the State and local authorities.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Very well. That is the same thing in effect.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator call my attention to the place where that is found?

Mr. PAGE. Yes; in just a moment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I rose only to make a few general observations about this bill. It does not affect the people of my State very much. As I said the other day, we have no great cities. We come directly in contact with the benefits of the agricultural extension system. We are an agricultural community. We know what the experiment stations are doing in our midst. We know what the experiments with drought-resisting plants are doing in parts of our State that are sometimes afflicted by drought. We know how directly we benefit from all that, and, of course, we welcome the provisions of what is known here as the Lever bill. But I think we should take a broader view of the situation than that which affects us in our localities. When we consider the conditions prevailing in the United States generally, in its great cities, in its congested centers, and the stern problems of life that the children who are growing up to-day must face from this time on, I believe the provisions of this bill are reaching out in the right direction, and I am in favor of it.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, answering the Senator from Georgia, I would refer to section 31, the latter part of which reads as follows:

But there shall in no case be disbursed under the terms of this act to any school or college, out of moneys derived from the secondary school department fund, the industrial or home economics school fund, the district agricultural school fund, the college teachers' training fund, or the normal teachers' training fund, as provided in this act, more money than 50 per cent of the amount which is supplied and expended during the same period for the same purpose, for which such fund is to be expended, out of either State and local or State or local public moneys.

In other words, the Federal Government pays 50 per cent and the State and local authorities 100 per cent, making 2 for 1.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there is a theoretical and a practical side to the provisions of this bill. I suppose if I deal with the practical side of it I shall subject myself to the charge of pessimism. I am willing, however, to chance that charge if I may bring to the attention of the country at large, and especially to the farming population, some provisions of this bill to the end that they shall not be deceived in regard to what it means for them.

I represent a farming section—one purely agricultural. I know the needs of that section. I know what kind of a bill will benefit it. I have seen resolutions and bills pass the Senate and the House designed to make farm life more genteel and pleasing, with the intent that some benefit would be derived by the farming community from them. But there is just one thing in the world that will take the people from the congested cities to the farm, and that is to make farming more profitable. There is the foundation, and there necessarily must be the foundation, of any legislation that is to affect our farming industry—make farming profitable.

Population will always drift to the field of greatest remuneration. That is a law which no character of legislation can possibly change; and the only way we can by legislation effect the drift of population from one section of the country to another is to make it more profitable for the people of one section of the country to go to another section of the country.

The one thing that makes farming unprofitable to-day more than any other one thing is the cost of farm labor, and the reason for the cost of the farm labor lies in the scarcity of farm help due to the greater remuneration in the great cities, and the lesser hours of labor in all lines of employment.

I appreciate the theoretical side of this bill, namely, that we are attempting to overcome the lack of labor to operate our farms as they should be operated by teaching intensified agriculture, so that a given amount of labor expended by the farmer and his family upon the farm, where he can not secure labor outside, may be more profitable to him, and to that extent that portion of the bill which relates purely to agricultural extension and agricultural education may operate to the benefit of the farmers of the country. But by an amendment which has come into the bill since it was originally introduced we have abandoned the original policy. Instead of educating the owner of a business to make that business more profitable by seeking to introduce methods that will economize in labor and expense, we go outside of that, in section 10 of the amendment, and provide for the industrial education of the laborer employed in such business. We do not do this for the farmer.

There is not a single line in this bill that educates a boy to become a farm laborer. This bill, by section 10, is designed to furnish and increase the supply of skilled labor for work in the cities, but nowhere do we seek to increase the supply of farm laborers. There is that which educates the owner of the land so to economize or so to intensify his farming operations as possibly to make them more profitable.

We want to get the boys away from the cities and back on the farms. We want the boys, of whom the Senator from Vermont has been speaking, those who grow in ways of idleness, and who become criminals, to abandon their evil associates in the cities and to get out onto the farms where temptations are few indeed and the surroundings morally healthful.

Will we be able to accomplish this under this bill? I can hardly believe that we are adopting the proper method in carrying this bill beyond the question of instruction in agriculture at the present time. We are not extending it to instruction in agricultural labor. And if we do not extend it to instruction in agricultural labor, why should we extend it to education in other kinds of labor?

I could see some consistency in the two portions of the bill if section 10, for instance, provided that education should be given for the purpose of economizing in the operation of mines or economizing in the operation of factories, so that a given amount of labor in the mine or in the factory would produce a greater result. Then you would have two sections of the same bill which reached toward the same purpose. But I believe you could properly take section 10 as an independent measure and entitle it "A bill to induce the boys on the farm to enter into the cities and obtain a vocational education."

We already teach that vocational education of the character provided in this bill in every city of any importance in the land and in every little town. Take the case of a boy on the farm; let us look at the practical side of this matter as it affects him. He knows that he has to labor from 12 to 16 hours a day on the farm. He knows that his remuneration for that 16 hours a day is never, on the average, a dollar a day. He knows that. There is not a farmer in the country, if he were compelled to pay the wages that are paid in the cities for a given number of hours of energy upon the farm, that would not go into bankruptcy in less than six months.

Now, you invite the farm boy, by reason of the greater remuneration and the lesser number of hours in the city, to abandon the farm and go into the nearest little town and there obtain a vocational education to become a carpenter, a bricklayer, a blacksmith, or any other skilled laborer. It will certainly benefit him under present conditions to leave the farm, and I believe under section 10 we are expending the general funds of the country to draw the young man from the farm rather than to induce the people of the overcrowded cities to migrate to the farm. I am speaking now from the farmer side of the question, from the practical side of it. While we may get some benefit from this intensified farming, which is, of course, the real purpose of this bill, I doubt if that will not be overcome by the excessive prices of farm labor brought about by taking the boys from the farm and leading them to the cities and teaching them city vocations.

I wish, Mr. President, not only to bring to the attention of the Senator who asks us to go into this new field of producing labor the importance of entering other fields, but so that the country at large when reading the record of this debate will at least know that there has been one Senator who represents a farming community who believes that there may be as much injury resulting from section 10 to the farming interests as there will be benefits derived under the other portions of the bill.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from North Dakota that the National Grange, which is perhaps the strongest farmers' organization in the Northern States, has given this bill extended and very careful consideration and have unanimously passed resolutions indorsing it. The National Farmers' Congress, which is very strong in the South, have taken it up not in a perfunctory way but with a great deal of painstaking care, and having decided that this bill is what they want, they have indorsed it. I do not know of a single national farmers' organization in this country that has not put its stamp of approval on the bill except possibly the Dry Farming Congress. The executive secretary of that body has written me that he is for the Page bill, and I understand from another source that the organization has indorsed the Lever bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have no doubt but that any farm organization feeling that they would get a benefit from some provision of the bill would pass a resolution in favor of it without considering very much possibly what the effect might be of some other provision of the bill. Their minds would be centered only upon the question of the benefits to be derived under a certain section. I should like to have some farm organization, however, answer the proposition I have made here, that the practical operation of section 10 would be to draw the farm boy from his home and send him to the nearest town and learn some vocation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. PAGE. Just a word, if the Senator from Nebraska will allow me. In the Senator's State and in the great Northwest the bankers' association have taken this matter under advisement and have discussed it at length. They have sent me a report of their meetings devoted to this particular feature. I do not know what the bankers of the East wish, but I know that the bankers of North Dakota, of Minnesota, and that section of the country have devoted to the Page bill at least one-third of its annual report, and they are assuming to speak for the best economic interests of the great Northwest.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator, because he has read it, what the banking or agricultural organizations have said specifically as to the operation of section 10 of the bill? Have they said anything?

Mr. PAGE. I interrupted the Senator from Nebraska and will not longer trespass upon his time now. I shall perhaps answer the Senator from North Dakota later.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I rose to express the hope that the Senate will accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont to the House bill. I favor the House bill. I have some doubt whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont has been well digested, but I believe that such changes as are necessary to perfect his amendment can be well worked out by the conference committee, to which the bill will probably ultimately go.

I do not agree fully with what my friend the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has said as to the effects of this amendment upon the rural population. The great fact that we are compelled to confront is that over the course of recent years there has been an enormous increase in the relative population that lives in our cities. At the present time something in the neighborhood of one-half of all the population of the United States live in what we call the large towns or cities, which constitute the urban population. We may deplore this. We may wish that the proportion were not so large. We may wish that more boys would stay upon the farm. We may differ as to the reasons which tend to increase the population in our cities. But whatever the reason and however we argue, the great fact is that half the population of the United States have selected that mode of life. This being the fact, it seems to me that when we come to legislate and provide national aid to encourage the States to help in making useful citizens we should bear in mind not only those who are on the farms, but those who, for one reason or another, are within the cities.

I agree fully with what the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] said, that the education which we are giving in our public schools is not well calculated at the present time either to hold the boys in the schools or to make of those who attend the schools useful citizens. Those who graduate in our public schools have theoretical knowledge, no doubt; they have education of a certain sort; but they are not receiving that education which fits them to be useful and valuable members of society. This fact is appreciated in most of the States, and many of these city educators appreciate it to some extent, but in spite of all that appreciation the various States and the various cities go on with their education largely of a theoretical nature. Congress has the power by appropriating a certain sum of money to be used under certain conditions to modify to some extent this education in our public schools. I believe this bill affords that opportunity.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has said that the effect of section 10 of the amendment will be to draw the boys from the farms to the schools in the city in order that they may get an education which will fit them better to fight the battle of life and fit them better to enjoy the opportunities of success in life. I doubt whether that is so, but if it is true it is a concession to the excellence of this bill. To my mind those who leave city life and go into country life are those who have learned to do something with their hands as a rule.

You find that carpenters will go into country life at certain periods and try their chances upon farms, because they have learned to do something with their hands. So with bricklayers—and the Senator has referred to bricklayers. I believe that by cultivating a knowledge of manual work, by teaching some useful employment, by teaching the city-bred boy to use his hands and his body in some useful work, you are more apt to lay the foundation for ultimately inducing him to go on a farm where all that training will ultimately be of some benefit.

So, Mr. President, whatever the cause may be which has led to the congestion of the population in our great cities, I believe we should recognize the fact that it exists, and in passing a measure to encourage useful training and to make valuable citizens we should take the city as well as the country into account, and help all the thousands and tens of thousands of boys and girls who are now getting a smattering of an education, theoretical knowledge, to acquire something that will be useful to them in future life.

This refers not to the cities only but, as I understand the character of the Senator's bill, it provides for teaching in household economics, which is of particular value to women. If this country is in need of any particular thing it is a knowledge of household economics, and it should be encouraged among the women of the land, among whom it has lately fallen into very serious desuetude.

Before taking my seat, Mr. President, however, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to what seems to be an omission in several of the sections here. I think if he will turn to section 11 he will find that he has failed to make provision for the appropriation of the money which he mentions there, and the same is true of section 12 and also of sections 13, 14, and 15. I suppose it is due to the fact that he hastily drew this substitute. I would therefore suggest to him, if he will take the memorandum, that on page 9, line 6, after the word "sixteen," he insert the words "is hereby appropriated," and again, on page 10, line 11, after the word "sixteen," to insert the words "is hereby annually appropriated."

Mr. LODGE. If I may say a word——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I think that matter of appropriation would have to be made in the annual bill. If the law establishes the service, whatever it may be, and fixes the amount, the appropriations from year to year would have to be made in the regular bill. We could not make an annual appropriation in this bill in the nature of a fixed charge. Of course, the appropriation bills would have to carry the appropriations, because it is necessary that they should carry everything that is needful to enforce existing law.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That occurred to me, but I notice that in section 10 the author of the bill makes the appropriation annually thereafter, and in the sections I have referred to it is omitted.

Mr. LODGE. I think that is perhaps unusual. The bill authorizes the appropriation just as a bill fixes a salary. It does not appropriate; it fixes the salary of an office; and then the annual appropriation bill, being required by statute, makes the appropriation year after year for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me, I will read the language of section 12 as an illustration to show that something is lacking to indicate plainly that Congress intends to have this as an annual appropriation hereafter. It reads as follows:

That for the maintenance of instruction in agriculture and home economics in agricultural high schools, as hereinafter provided, the sum of $3,000,000 annually, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, such sum to be allotted annually to the States in proportion to the number of persons engaged in agricultural pursuits—

And so on.

There is no statement as to what is to be done annually.

Mr. SMOOT. This is an allotment and not the appropriation. If you make the appropriation direct and make it apply for this year and the year hereafter, then at any time when any change is made the law itself would have to be amended, whereas if you make the allotment now for this year——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I realize there would have to be an appropriation annually from time to time, as is always the case, I understand, with fixed annual appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, providing it simply says "annually," but if it says "hereafter," then it is a fixed amount, and the only way it could be changed would be by changing the law itself.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator from Utah will read the section carefully he will find that there is not an appropriation or allotment or anything else. There is an entire absence of anything affirmative.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is evidently the omission of some words to indicate what is to be done. I propose to cure it by inserting the words "annually appropriated." The sentence is incomplete; it is not finished.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I have for nearly a year past told the junior Senator from Vermont, the author of the pending amendment, that I would vote for it, and if I had the opportunity to vote for it as a separate proposition I would still do so. I have always told him, however, that my own State would not be able to receive any benefit from the measure, because of her inability to comply with the conditions that were attached to the grant from the General Government. Yet I told him that would not prevent me from voting for a bill which I recognized would bring a large measure of benefit to large sections of the country, because under those circumstances the fact that it brought no benefit to my immediate State or my section would not justify me, in my opinion, in voting against it.

But the proposition now before us is this: If I vote for the Page bill as a substitute for the Smith bill I assist in eliminating from further consideration entirely the Smith bill, which, while it is not of such general scope in its application, yet will bring material benefit to every State in the Union.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THORNTON. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think, perhaps, the Senator is under a misapprehension as to the present status. The Senator from Vermont is not offering his bill as a substitute for the Smith-Lever bill, but is accepting the Smith-Lever bill as it has been perfected, and is merely proposing to add certain sections to it to incorporate his views and provide for industrial education. So the Smith-Lever bill will remain a part of the bill, if it is adopted with this amendment.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I will give the answer to that. I have taken pains to investigate, through inquiries among Members of the House, as to what would be the chances of the Page bill passing the House if it was passed by the Senate, and I am justified in assuming that there would not only be the gravest doubt about the passage of the bill, but that the probability would be against it. That would apply to the very case that is now submitted by the Senator from Nebraska, because there are so many of the provisions of the Page bill which added to the Smith bill would be objectionable to the House that I most seriously doubt its passage there. As between the proposition of voting for a bill which has already passed the House and will become a law if it passes the Senate and voting for a bill which, if it passes the Senate, will not, in my opinion, pass the House, I could not hesitate. For these reasons I am obliged to vote against the substitute.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I beg to remind the Senator from Louisiana who has just spoken that there is another way in which this can be accomplished. I am as much interested in the House bill as he can possibly be, but I am likewise interested in some of the features of the Page bill, so called.

Now, if we attach a part or all of the Page bill to the House bill as an amendment, or amendments, then the subject is in conference, and we will get at the least the House bill. We may get, I hope will get, a part or all of the so-called Page bill.

I hope, therefore, that no Senator will vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont for the reason that he fears that if it should be adopted it will not receive the concurrence of the House, because we can not in any event lose the House bill.

I believe it commands a very large majority in the Senate, and we have a right to assume that it will continue to have a majority in the House. Therefore we ought not to decide this matter upon any such proposition.

The real truth is we ought to come back to the issue stated by the Senator from North Dakota. A Senator who does not believe in vocational training ought to vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont. One who does believe in vocational education ought to vote for the proposal of the Senator from Vermont, or at least help to so adjust that proposal that it will be workable, if it is not already so.

I for one believe in vocational education. I do not believe in the policy that would pour out money from the Treasury of the United States for the benefit of the farmer and leave the worker in the cities without aid. I think the Senator from North Dakota has possibly analyzed it with a good deal of accuracy. I suppose it is true that if we were in this country to pursue a policy which would make the lives of those who work in the cities or towns at the trades as miserable and as hopeless as possible, there would be a greater tendency and a greater temptation for them to return or, if not to return, to go to the country and enter agricultural pursuits.

But I do not believe that this country can be carried on upon any such policy of education. It does not make any difference what effect it has upon the wages of agricultural labor, it is our duty—and I am not now speaking particularly about the duty of the Federal Government, but I am speaking of the duty of members of society—it is our duty to make as happy and as comfortable and as efficient the workers in trades as we try to make the workers who pursue agriculture as a means of livelihood.

Indeed, the problem of the city is vastly more serious than the problem of the country. If neither the State nor the General Government ever extended one particle of aid to those who live in the country—I mean aid in training, aid in education, aid in formulating character—there would still be no menace from those who live in the country. The very conditions which surround them protect society against the excesses which are so often observed in the crowded populations. If we could do but one thing, it would be our first duty to help to train the boys who, above all other boys, need training.

There is not much danger from the country boy. He will never go far wrong. There is danger from the city boy and the town boy. I need not describe the influences which affect the life of the one and the life of the other. Therefore I have always thought that we ought in our school system to give our first concern to the culture, the training, the education of the boy who through his life as a man would probably be surrounded by many temptations, by many difficulties.

I am for vocational education. I regard it as of the highest necessity for the future, if we would guard ourselves against the dangers which are now so apparent. Upon this point all careful observers are in agreement that we ought to give these boys, and these girls, too, because it is not limited to boys, every opportunity to become upright, self-respecting, self-supporting, efficient members of society.

I am speaking in behalf of a people largely engaged in agriculture, because in my State that is the dominant industry. I would feel a sense of humiliation if we were now to enlarge our appropriation or contribution for agriculture and not make a beginning, at least, in this even greater work of training our young men and our young women in the trades and industries.

I know that there are some objections to this bill in its present form. They are not, however, serious. If we do not in the very first instance succeed in getting a perfect bill, there will be abundant opportunity in the future to correct any inadequacies that may now creep into it.

I earnestly hope that, having now the opportunity, we will join the States in the efforts they are making for vocational training. The contribution is not great, it is true, but it points the right policy. It indicates that the General Government intends to do something that is adequate and enduring in this grave problem before us, and I think it would be a profound mistake if we did not now add to this contribution to the agricultural interests of the country—and no one supports that contribution with more heartiness than I—a contribution for beginning this other work. I mean beginning it on the part of the Government of the United States, because it has already been begun in every intelligent and patriotic community in the country. Let us go hand in hand with these two great branches of education and carry them on together.

I realize when it is said in the letter from a distinguished educator of New York that we might as well do a great many other things as to do this the force of the suggestion. I do not know when I will be willing to stop making contributions to worthy purposes; I hope I will never be able to stop if the contributions will promote the object sought to be accomplished. My friend Pritchett is wrong about this bill. He is a very learned man; he is one of the best men in the United States, and is profoundly interested in education. Of course you all know him as one of the advisers and administrators of Mr. Carnegie's benevolence, charity, and philanthropy; but he is wrong about this bill. He seems to assume that the Government of the United States is to enter the secondary schools of the several States and readjust them, participating in their conduct and management. It is a mistake. There is nothing in this bill that proposes anything of that kind. The utmost that it proposes is that a board of vocational education shall prepare a plan for the expenditure of money for this particular purpose, and that that plan shall be submitted to the Secretary of the Interior, and, if approved by him, then the money passes into the treasury of the State, to be paid out under the regulations of the vocational board. I think if Mr. Pritchett did not overlook these provisions of the bill he at least did not fully realize their force.

Before I conclude, Mr. President—and I had but a word to say about it—I intend to offer an amendment to the amendment. Senators will note a print of the Page bill which was presented on the 17th of January that has been changed, as explained by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] after a consultation with or a conference with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. The Senator from Vermont, as he told the Senate the other day, accepted certain changes, and among them he rewrote section 3 of the print of January 17, and it has become section 10 of the print of January 24.

I do not like the substitute as well as I like the original. My chief objection to it is that it strikes out the appropriation for the trades and industries in the secondary schools and limits the help to agricultural and domestic economy. In my State the secondary schools are filled with pupils who have more interest in the trades and industries than they have in agriculture. They are all in cities or towns, and it would be vastly better for the State I in part represent if this aid were given to the trades and industries in the secondary schools as well as to agriculture.

Again, I do not exactly understand the name used in the new print. What is a "rural high school"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from Iowa that I disclaim any responsibility for that name or for the details of that paragraph. I do not think it reaches at all what I had in view.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not mean to have it inferred from anything that I have said that the Senator from Georgia is responsible for it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I merely want to express my agreement with the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I only know that the Senator from Vermont said the other day that the Senator from Georgia had made certain suggestions to him with regard to this particular phase of the matter, but I did not understand that the Senator from Georgia had rewritten the section.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then I ask the Senator from Vermont what is meant by "rural high school"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My suggestion would be that you strike out the word "high" and let it read "rural schools."

Mr. CUMMINS. I myself prefer, Mr. President, the language of the section as it was, namely, "secondary school," and I offer section 3 of the print of January 17 for section 10 of the print of January 24; that is to say, I move to strike out section 10 of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont and to substitute in lieu of the part stricken out section 3 in the print of January 17.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK of Wyoming in the chair). The Senator from Iowa proposes an amendment to the amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7 it is proposed to strike out from line 17 down to and including line 22, on page 8, and to insert:

That for the maintenance of instruction in agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics in departments or divisions of schools of secondary grade, other than the separate industrial or home economics schools and the separate district agricultural high schools for which provision is hereinafter made, the sum of $3,000,000 annually, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, such sum to be allotted annually to the States and the District of Columbia in proportion to their population as shown by the Federal census next preceding the year for which such allotment is made. The moneys appropriated under this section shall be known as the secondary school department fund.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not think the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is sound. My objection to it is that I do not think it is possible to do any good with an appropriation of this character used in the way section 3 provides. It proposes to appropriate $3,000,000, $3,000,000 more to be appropriated by the States, making $6,000,000, to be used in our secondary schools throughout the entire country for the purpose of giving instruction in three things—agriculture, the industries and trades, and home economics. There are over 13,000 schools of the secondary grade, and to undertake to distribute $6,000,000, or even $12,000,000, to 13,000 and more schools for the purpose of giving instruction in agriculture, instruction in the industries and trades, and instruction in home economics is to provide for the distribution of your fund so thinly that nothing can be done with it. You can not put this instruction into the ordinary high school; you can not mix agriculture and the industries and trades in all these high schools; you can not introduce the industries and the trades into high schools by the use of a thousand dollars to the school, and you would not have that much if you had $12,000,000. If you had $13,000,000, you would only have, I believe, a thousand dollars to the school.

My observations as well as my advice is that to do industrial and trades work you must have a distinct plant, and you must equip it with experts—experts both in the hand and in the head. I suggested to the Senator from Vermont that his section 3 would be simply a waste of money; I objected to it because I believed it was an impracticable appropriation, one from which nothing could come, and that it would be far better to put the whole of it into his next section and make our appropriation apply to schools that have distinctive departments, plants, equipment, and officers, to really do something in the line of instruction in the industries and trades.

Mr. President, while I am on my feet, I wish to add that I am going to vote against the proposed amendment of the Senator from Vermont because I do not think it is well digested. I am in favor of vocational education; I am intensely in favor of special training upon the line of the trades and industries; I believe thoroughly in instruction in home economics, and I sincerely believe in agricultural training; but I do not believe that the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont has been yet worked out. One great trouble with it when we undertake to involve the National Government in this class of work, is the question of how far the National Government is to simply turn the money over to the States and let it alone, and how far the National Government is to follow the money and undertake to interfere with the secondary school and the plans of education in detail in the States.

I am opposed to this amendment as it is now drawn, because it retains too much power in the National Government with reference to secondary schools. I am utterly opposed to the Commissioner of Education interfering in any way with our high schools in Georgia or our rural schools. There might be a man in that position—there have been men in that position—that I would not mind interfering. Take old Dr. Harris, who was the great Commissioner of Education of 20 years ago. If I had a guaranty that such a man as he would always be the Commissioner of Education, I would not object; but only last year we had brought to our attention the fact that the Commissioner of Education had undertaken to grade, through some one of his employees, the colleges of the United States, and to say just what each amounted to. He did it in such an absurd and utterly inaccurate manner that it was almost ludicrous. I would not want any national money to come to Georgia for our secondary schools if the plan of their management and the rules of their conduct were subject to his supervision and direction. We would rather do it for ourselves.

I believe that problem can be worked out. There is too much power left nominally in the Secretary of the Interior, but, in reality in the Commissioner of Education, to satisfy me with this measure as it stands. I believe that if we would let the House bill pass and take up the bill of the Senator from Vermont when it is reached on January 30, and proceed with the consideration of it, we would accomplish better results. It is a great piece of legislation; it is a new line of work; and even if we do not get through with it at this session we will have made progress. I think if we could have a commission composed of men from different parts of the country work on it for us, and make suggestions, that before the end of 12 months we could work out the problem.

The Senator from Vermont has invited me to make suggestions, and I have made them; but I could not to-day draft a bill for which I myself would be willing to vote. I do not as yet sufficiently understand the matter as it bears upon all parts of the country to know just what shape the bill ought to assume.

I am for vocational education. I hope to see a plan worked out by which the National Government will contribute toward vocational education and help inspire additional work both for the boy in the vocational school and for the grown artisan, after the plan pursued in Germany, especially in Berlin, where their part-day schools advance the standard of skill of their full-grown artisans; but I can not vote for this amendment as it stands. I am going to vote against it.

Mr. LODGE. I send to the desk an amendment, which, at the appropriate time, I intend to offer to the so-called Lever bill, and I ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I would say nothing further on this bill did I not consider that the remarks of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] have rather placed words in my mouth, or a construction on my words, which is entirely inconsistent with my own intendment or with my words themselves. The Senator assumed, though I can scarcely understand the basis of that assumption, that if I raised a question concerning a bill introduced primarily for the purpose of assisting the rural communities of the country in agricultural education but providing more benefit to and bestowing more attention upon urban education, I therefore must be opposed to vocational education.

Mr. President, I think I can safely make a suggestion as to this bill without being accused of opposing vocational education. I do not oppose it in any way. I think it one of the advanced steps which should be taken in education in our great cities, but, Mr. President, we must look at this bill under present conditions, and we must and should understand just exactly what its effect may be.

The great trouble in the cities now is that they are oversupplied with labor. That is the complaint on the part of the labor unions, it is the complaint on the part of the cities, that there is not work enough for the labor in the great cities. On the contrary, the rural districts are not supplied with a sufficient amount of labor, and yet we have a provision here that exaggerates rather than mitigates the evil of the lack of labor in the rural districts and an oversupply of labor in the urban districts.

This bill, Mr. President, goes much further in urban education than it does in rural education. There is, as I have said, not a sentence in the bill that provides for the education of farm labor. All of the appropriations which are to be used in the urban districts are for the purpose of teaching people to earn a livelihood; in other words, it is to instruct the boys in education along vocational lines. In every city in the country we now have those facilities. I do not think there is a boy in the city of Washington who can not obtain a vocational education if he desires to obtain it. That is not true as regards agricultural labor in the country. I can appreciate the fact why it is difficult that it could be made true that you could teach a boy the vocation of a farm laborer. In the city of New York, and in every other city in the Union, I believe, there are sufficient schools to accommodate those who desire to learn any vocation. The objection that I find to this bill is that we are giving more attention to the urban than we are to the rural districts in the line of education.

Mr. President, I intend to vote for the Page amendment. I intend to vote for it with the hope that when the bill goes to conference we can probably find some way of so amending it that even better provision can be made for the interests of the rural population without any injustice to the urban population; but I certainly shall not retract any words which I have uttered that will put the farming population in possession of the truth in reference to this bill. It does not mean, because I prefer to make this bill purely an agricultural one, that I am necessarily opposed to vocational education, nor does it mean, because I assert that the farm laborer can not under present conditions receive as much for his service as do those who labor in the city, that I must therefore be in favor of starving those in the city into a condition in which they must go to the farm. I think we can reach a proper result without injustice to any class of labor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska has called attention to the fact that in certain sections of the bill certain sums of money were provided but were not appropriated. I believe the mistake happened in this way: I find that section 2 of the original bill, S. 3, provides as follows:

> That the several sums as herein provided in section 3 to section 10, inclusive, be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated—

And so forth.

In the substitute almost the exact words of other sections have been used, but section 2 has been omitted. I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to the fact that section 2 should be included in his substitute if he wishes to use the language that he uses in sections 10, 11, 12, and a few others.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska has very kindly aided me in this matter, so that it will take only a moment to change the phraseology satisfactorily. The Senator is right. In drawing the new bill to make it harmonious with the Lever bill section 2 was omitted.

I move that on page 9, line 6, after the word "sixteen," the words "is hereby appropriated" be inserted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On page 10, line 11, after the word "sixteen," I move to insert the words "is hereby annually appropriated."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Why not say "is hereby appropriated," so as to use the same language in all of the sections? I suggest using in one section whatever language is used in the other, viz, "is hereby appropriated."

Mr. PAGE. I think the Senator will find that that is right as it is now. The Senator from Nebraska has very carefully gone over it. The language is slightly different. I should like to use the words "is hereby annually appropriated."

In section 13, page 11, line 2, after the word "thereafter," I move to insert the words "is hereby appropriated."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On the same page, in section 14, after "1913," line 21, I move to insert the words "is hereby annually appropriated."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. In the same section, on page 12, at the end of line 2, after the amount "$3,000," I move to insert the words "shall be allotted."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. In section 15, line 8, page 12, after "1913," I move to insert the words "is hereby annually appropriated."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On the same page, line 14, after the word "annually," I move to insert the words "is hereby appropriated."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. In line 23, on the same page, after "1913," I move to insert the words "is hereby appropriated."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. That, I believe, makes the appropriation part of the bill entirely correct.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is there not another place on page 12, or did the Senator state that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has the right to modify his amendment without the Senate voting on these amendments. The Chair understands that is a pending amendment. The Senator from Vermont, however, has modified his amendment as indicated. The question is upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the proposed amendment it is proposed to strike out section 10 and insert the following as section 10:

That for the maintenance of instruction in agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics in departments or divisions of schools of secondary grade other than the separate industrial or home economics schools and the separate district agricultural high schools for which provision is hereinafter made, the sum of $3,000,000 annually, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, such sum to be allotted annually to the States and the District of Columbia in proportion to their population as shown by the Federal census next preceding the year for which such allotment is made. The moneys appropriated under this section shall be known as the secondary school department fund.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not intend to delay the Senate by arguing the matter further, except to say that I understand the provision is very inadequate; but it is no more inadequate than the one for which it is to be substituted. In fact, it is more adequate because it appropriates $3,000,000, whereas the one which I seek to strike out appropriates but $2,000,000.

But the Senator from Georgia is very much mistaken about one thing. That is that this admits the General Government to the management or control of the secondary schools of the State. I think he overlooks the fact that before any money can be paid out to the States under this section a plan must be formulated by the vocational board, or the board of vocational education, and must be submitted to the Secretary of the Interior and approved by him.

Unless the board can present a plan by which this money will accomplish the purpose in view, of course there would be no money paid out under it. If it were shown that the $1,000 for each school or $2,000 for each school could not be expended so as substantially and materially to aid in the work of the school, of course the Secretary of the Interior would not approve the plan, and that State would not receive any part of this appropriation.

Broadly speaking, I do not believe you can make a more effective regulation than to give it into the hands of the vocational board. If we have a plan prepared by that board and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, I think we can assume that while the aid would be inadequate it would not be useless.

I do not see any difference on that score, however, between what I have proposed as a substitute for section 10 and section 10 itself, save that instead of calling these "secondary schools," as they are ordinarily called, they are called "rural high schools." I think that is a misnomer, because some of them would be rural and some of them would not be. Take the high school in my own city, a city of 100,000 people; would it be called a rural high school.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all. The modification, as I understand, was this, if the Senator will permit me: A million dollars of the amount appropriated here was transferred to the next section, so as to give $4,000,000 for industrial vocational education in schools that had approved plans and that were really prepared to do substantial work in the industries and trades. Then the industries and trades were omitted from section 3; and the two millions left were to be used for farm and domestic or home economics work.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I understand that; but there is no definition of "rural high school," so far as I know.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Where the author got the idea of a rural high school I do not know. In discussing the matter with me, he contemplated having a leader in agricultural work who would take a section of territory and visit the rural schools and teach the teachers and teach the children, especially in agricultural lines, covering a territory of rural schools.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not depreciate the value of that kind of work; but the next section does not take in any high school that may have a department for the trades and industries. They must be, as I quote now—

In separate industrial or home economics schools.

No matter how well equipped a high school might be to carry on the vocational education, it would not be able to receive any aid under the following section—formerly section 4, now section 11—because it would not be a separate economics or industrial school.

I have nothing further to say about the amendment I have offered to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I move to insert, on page 1, line 6, after the word "State," the words "and Territory."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Wyoming that that portion of the amendment has been abandoned. Doubtless his amendment would apply to the House bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am reading from the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont to-day—from the print of January 24.

Mr. PAGE. That has been changed.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then I will change my motion and move that the Secretary be instructed to insert in the bill at the proper place the words "and Territory" in connection with the word "State," the intention being to secure for the Territories the benefit of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 6, after the word "State," it is proposed to insert "and Territory."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Was the Senator on the floor this morning when an amendment was adopted extending it to Hawaii, Alaska, and Porto Rico and providing that, before any money should be paid to either, the Secretary of Agriculture should determine that their colleges were ready to proceed with the work?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; I was not here, Mr. President. I regret that I was not here.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That amendment was adopted this morning as a part of the main bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then I will not urge the amendment that I have proposed, although I may present it later to the bill if the bill should not pass to-night. I have an indistinct recollection that Hawaii even now comes under the provisions of the old act; and if it comes under the provisions of the old act it ought not to have more restrictions placed upon it than are placed upon like States and Territories in the bill. But I will withdraw my amendment to the amendment for the present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in view of what has been said by the Senator from Georgia as to the adoption of an amendment this morning—I was not on the floor at that time, and I may not be when the bill is perfected—I should like at this point to suggest that there are several other places in the bill that I think ought to be looked at.

For instance, on page 5, the amendment provides that money shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States—to the treasurer or other officer of the State duly authorized by the laws of the State to receive the same.

I think perhaps that language would not cover the District of Alaska. They may not have what is known as a State treasurer there.

Similar language appears on page 14, in line 22, where it provides that the States—shall, through the legislative authority thereof, accept the provisions of this act relating to such fund, and shall appoint the State treasurer custodian.

I think these expressions, perhaps, ought to be modified if the amendment has been adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hardly think that is true. I think a general provision extending the provisions of the bill to Hawaii, Alaska, and Porto Rico would carry with it such a construction as would make the necessary modification of the particular language theretofore used with reference to the States. But that is a matter which can be investigated in detail a little later on.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is the only purpose I had in saying what I did. I do not know whether the district of Alaska has any such official as would compare with the treasurer of a State of the Union. My object is simply to draw attention to that point.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Under the terms of the bill it would be some one duly authorized by the Legislature of Alaska to receive it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The bill itself provides in one place that the State shall designate the State treasurer or some other officer to receive this money.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; the duly constituted authorities of the State.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, on the other page that I alluded to it is provided that the State treasurer shall be the custodian. All my interest in it is to have the terms of the bill in harmony, so that it will be workable.

While I am on my feet I should like to make another suggestion to the Senator from Vermont. On page 19, in section 25, the amendment provides:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall annually * * * ascertain whether such State or the District of Columbia is using moneys received by it out of the rural-school fund, the industrial-school fund, the agricultural high-school fund, the college teachers' training fund, or the teachers' training fund in accordance with the spirit and terms of this act.

The terms of the act are perfectly visible, but the spirit of it may not be. I move to strike out the words "spirit and," so that the law may be administered according to its terms.

Mr. PAGE. I accept that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to give notice that on Wednesday morning, at the close of the morning business, I shall ask the Senate to resume the consideration of House bill 22871.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE SYLVESTER C. SMITH.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. SYLVESTER C. SMITH, late a Representative from the State of California, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolutions just received from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 27, 1913.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. SYLVESTER CLARK SMITH, a Representative from the State of California.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions I send to the desk, for which I ask present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions submitted by the Senator from California will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions (S. Res. 443), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. SYLVESTER C. SMITH, late a Representative from the State of California.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Representative SYLVESTER C. SMITH the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 28, 1913, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, draw near to us as we draw near to Thee and fill our minds with clear perceptions, noble desires, pure convictions, and the courage to live them, that we may be one with Thee in the furtherance of every good, and thus be strengthened by imparting strength, wise by imparting wisdom, pure by imparting purity as we journey through life's rugged way, and so glorify Thee in a faithful service to our fellow men.

Once more in the dispensation of Thy providence death has entered our family and taken from us a faithful servant. Comfort us and his bereaved family by the blessed hope of the life eternal; in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DISTRICT DAY.

The SPEAKER. This is District day, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized.

GERMAN ORPHAN ASYLUM ASSOCIATION.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 7508.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 7508) to amend an act entitled "An act to reincorporate and preserve all the corporate franchises and property rights of the de facto corporation known as the German Orphan Asylum Association of the District of Columbia."

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to reincorporate and preserve all the corporate franchises and property rights of the de facto corporation known as the German Orphan Asylum Association of the District of Columbia," approved on the 6th day of February, 1901, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding to and making a part of section 1 of the said act the following:

"And the said German Orphan Asylum Association of the District of Columbia may hereafter fix, limit, and determine the number of directors to constitute its board of directors by any constitution or constitutions which may hereafter be adopted by the said association, and the number of its said directors may be decreased or increased as provided by any constitution or constitutions, or any amendment or amendments thereto, which the said association may lawfully adopt."

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum, and move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. EDWARDS (during the counting). Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point temporarily.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS] withdraws the point temporarily.

Mr. MANN. I should like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] a question. If this bill should pass, giving to this corporation the authority to increase or decrease this board of directors as it pleased in the future, would that be practically in conformity with the general law in reference to corporations?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I have no more information on that subject, and perhaps not so much, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] himself.

Mr. MANN. I do not remember, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not remember either; but the committee was simply endeavoring to do what those in charge of the German Orphan Asylum desired, and we did not believe that there was any question as to their motives.

Mr. KAHN. I think they have a charter from the Congress.

Mr. MANN. As I understand from the report and the statements, they wish to increase the number of their board of directors. But suppose hereafter they should wish to decrease it to one; would that same power exist in reference to an ordinary corporation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am sure I do not know. I did not go into it with such detail as that, having absolute confidence in the management.

Mr. MANN. The management in the course of time might change.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not think it would change for the bad in this matter.

Mr. KAHN. I do not think that they would decrease it to one.

Mr. MANN. I think under this law they could increase it to a hundred or decrease it to one.

Mr. KAHN. The purpose is to give them additional power to that which they have.

Mr. MANN. This gives them the power to increase or decrease hereafter as they choose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Some of the managers of the asylum said the law was absolutely necessary in order to enable them to carry on their business.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was read a third time and passed.

FIFTH REGIMENT MARYLAND NATIONAL GUARD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I now call up Senate joint resolution 153.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 153) granting to the Fifth Regiment Maryland National Guard the use of the corridors of the courthouse of the District of Columbia upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the marshal of the District of Columbia.

Resolved, etc., That the marshal of the District of Columbia be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit the Fifth Regiment Maryland National Guard to occupy and use the corridors of the courthouse of the District of Columbia, from 6 o'clock in the evening of March 3 to 7 o'clock in the evening of March 4, 1913, upon such terms and conditions as the marshal of the District of Columbia shall impose upon the colonel of the Fifth Regiment Maryland National Guard.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT BY ELECTROCUTION.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up Senate bill 7162.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 7162) to amend section 801 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 801 of an act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, as amended by the acts approved January 31 and June 30, 1902, and subsequent acts to and including March 4, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 801. The punishment of murder in the first degree shall be death by electrocution. The punishment of death must, in every case, be inflicted by causing to pass through the body of the convict a current of electricity of sufficient intensity to cause death, and the application of such current must be continued until such convict is dead. The punishment of murder in the second degree shall be imprisonment for life or for not less than 20 years. In all cases where the accused is found guilty of the crime of murder in the first degree the jury may qualify their verdict by adding thereto 'without capital punishment,' and whenever a jury shall return a verdict as aforesaid the person convicted shall be sentenced to imprisonment for life."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] sure as to what effect the passage of this bill would have upon the persons now under sentence of death in the District?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I do not regard that as a question of importance. It is my opinion, however, that those who are now under sentence of death in the District of Columbia must be executed under the laws which were in existence at the time of the conviction and passage of sentence. We had practically the same subject in Kentucky two or three years ago, and my recollection is that that was determined to be the law there when we changed the method of capital punishment from hanging to electrocution.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is—and I am not certain how far it is correct—that there is a general law providing that where a law is repealed and changed it shall not affect a prosecution then being carried on. How far it would affect a case where sentence had been imposed I do not know. Here, for example, is a sentence, sentencing a man to be hanged until he is dead. Now, if you take away the power to hang that man, he probably goes free. There is now no way of punishing him.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I understand the bill was prepared by the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia, and I will further say that I myself in committee voted against the bill. This bill comes in with a report from the majority of the committee. I am in favor of inflicting the most ignominious kind of death possible upon a man guilty of deliberate murder. I believe that hanging is a more ignominious death than the other form, and for that reason I was against this bill. But I am here supporting it in accordance with the majority vote of the committee.

Mr. MANN. I presume that the district attorney in drafting the bill gave consideration to its effect upon sentences now in existence, although there is nothing in the letter of the commissioners upon that subject, as there should be.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

UNLAWFUL DEPOSITS IN THE POTOMAC RIVER.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up Senate bill 1072.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1072) to amend section 895 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, making harbor regulations, is hereby amended by adding thereto the following:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 895 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, making harbor regulations, is hereby amended by adding thereto the following:

"SEC. 895 a. That it shall be unlawful for any owner or occupant of any wharf or dock, any master or captain of any vessel, or any person or persons to cast, throw, drop, or deposit any stone, gravel, sand, ballast, dirt, oyster shells, or ashes in the water in any part of the Potomac River or its tributaries in the District of Columbia, or on the shores of said river below high-water mark, unless for the purpose of making a wharf, after permission has been obtained from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for that purpose, which wharf shall be sufficiently inclosed and secured so as to prevent injury to navigation.

"That it shall be unlawful for any owner or occupant of any wharf or dock, any captain or master of any vessel, or any other person or persons to cast, throw, deposit, or drop in any dock or in the waters of the Potomac River or its tributaries in the District of Columbia any dead fish, fish offal, dead animals of any kind, condemned oysters in the shell, watermelons, cantaloupes, vegetables, fruits, shavings, hay, straw, ice, snow, filth, or trash of any kind whatsoever.

"That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to interfere with the work of improvement in or along the said river and harbor under the supervision of the United States Government.

"That any person or persons violating any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100, or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both, in the discretion of the court."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, on page 2, line 11, I move to strike out the words "ice, snow" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "or," and also to strike out the words "or trash." That means sweepings.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 11, by striking out the words "ice, snow" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "or," and also striking out the words "or trash."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the idea of this bill is to prevent the depositing of stone, gravel, sand, and so forth, in the Potomac River within the District of Columbia, unless for the purpose of making a wharf after permission has been obtained from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Supposing somebody wants to build a wharf down at Alexandria, does he have to obtain the consent of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think the gentleman will find the jurisdiction accurately described in line 11, on page 1.

Mr. MANN. No. It reads:

In the water in any part of the Potomac River or its tributaries in the District of Columbia, or on the shores of said river below high-water mark.

The words "or on the shores of said river below high-water mark" do not seem to be limited to the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Illinois has often criticized bills that come from the Municipal Building, and he is pretty nearly always right.

Mr. MANN. I am not criticizing it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think I agree with the gentleman that this might have been more accurately drawn, but I think nobody will hesitate to give it the meaning that it applies to the District of Columbia alone.

Mr. LOBECK. Why did you strike out the word "trash"?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If they sweep the deck of a boat on the river, must they carry the sweepings ashore? We thought that was too small a matter to deal with, and so we concluded to strike it out.

Mr. LOBECK. All right.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

UNAUTHORIZED USE OF VEHICLES.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (S. 6919) to amend subchapter 2 of chapter 19 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Code of Law for the District of Columbia be amended by adding to subchapter 2 of chapter 19 the following section:

"SEC. 826b. Unauthorized use of vehicles.—Any person who, without the consent of the owner, shall take, use, operate, or remove, or cause to be taken, used, operated, or removed from a garage, stable, or other building, or from any place or locality on a public or private highway, park, parkway, street, lot, field, inclosure, or space, an automobile or motor vehicle, and operate or drive, or cause the same to be operated or driven for his own profit, use, or purpose, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both such fine and imprisonment."

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

OBSCENE OR VULGAR PICTURES.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2600) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to prevent the exhibition of obscene, lewd, indecent, or vulgar pictures in public places of amusement in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in addition to the police powers now vested in them, be, and they are hereby, empowered and directed to prevent the exhibition of obscene, lewd, indecent, or vulgar pictures in any theater, moving-picture show, or other public place of amusement in the District of Columbia, and to make all needful and necessary regulations for such purpose.

SEC. 2. That no picture film or picture intended for exhibition in any such theater, show, or other public place of amusement shall be exhibited without previous submission to the said commissioners for investigation and approval, and be approved, found, and determined by said commissioners, after opportunity to be heard, not to be obscene, lewd, indecent, or vulgar. Every violation of this act or of any regulation made under the authority hereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $40, on prosecution by information in the police court of the District of Columbia, filed in the name of said District of Columbia by the corporation counsel or any of his assistants.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

CATHERINE MARONEY.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up from the Private Calendar the bill (H. R. 23939) to legalize titles in the District of Columbia to certain citizens.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Private Calendar. The House will have to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. May we have the bill read first to see what it is?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Catherine Maroney, a citizen of the United States and a resident of the city of Leadville, in the State of Colorado, be, and she hereby is, authorized to acquire, hold, and dispose of any and all real estate lying in the District of Columbia, as heir at law of Mary Shugrue, a citizen of the United States and late of the District of Columbia, notwithstanding the alienage of the common ancestor of said Mary Shugrue and Edward D. Brown, son of said Catherine Maroney by her first husband, through whom the said Catherine Maroney traces her right to acquire the said real estate, and that all forfeitures incurred by reason of any act of Congress or law in force in the District of Columbia in respect of said real estate are hereby remitted; and further, that the United States hereby quitclaim and release in favor of said Catherine Maroney, her heirs and assigns, any and all title which they, the said United States, have in or to any real estate in the city of Washington and District of Columbia of which the said Mary Shugrue died seized and possessed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to have some explanation of the necessity for this legislation.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] will permit me, I will say in answer to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] that Mrs. Maroney, whom the bill is designed to benefit, owns, or thinks she owns, a small piece of land with a building upon it here in Washington. She has sought to dispose of it a number of times, asking the guaranty companies to pass upon the title, but by reason of certain confiscatory acts providing that title held by aliens should not pass, they would not certify this title to be perfect and it was deemed necessary to introduce this bill to relieve her of the embarrassment in the sale of this property. The Supreme Court of the United States passed upon a similar case, but left it in some doubt, and the Commissioners of the District, in writing upon this subject, disclose the fact that there is yet some doubt as to whether the acts of Congress heretofore enacted upon the subject of these titles, accompanied and fortified as they are by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, are effective. The bill can do no possible harm, and in this particular case it will enable the owner to sell it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. What does the property consist of?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. It is a small piece of real estate in the District of Columbia. I have not the description so that I can answer the gentleman's question. It is a piece of property that she fell heir to.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, this is a form of legislation that would not be permitted in any State in the Union that I know of. It would be forbidden by the constitution of almost every State in the Union. It is not permissible to validate private title by legislative act in this way. If the Congress of the United States has passed an act forbidding title by descent through aliens it does not seem to me that it is proper by private act to change that in individual cases. If that act is unjust, it ought to be repealed. If there is any other way to arrive at justice in this case, Congress ought not to be required to sit here and pass private acts. We have no information before us as to the extent of the interest of the United States in this property. The bill says that whatever interest the United States has shall be quitclaimed by this act and released in favor of said Catherine Maroney. I take it from that that the United States must have some interest necessary to be quitclaimed.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. That does not follow at all. The commissioners have found that this act on the face of it is to confirm the title to this claimant. It is not taking anything from the United States. It is to enable the owner to pass the property that has been in the possession and in the control and in the use of this party and beneficiaries and their ancestors for two generations. It is no use to make a bugbear of a matter of this sort. The gentleman knows very well that the United States has no title to this property, that if it had it would have been discovered. Many acts have been passed, and it is conceived by the legal adviser of the District of Columbia that there is no doubt about the title being in this woman at the present time, but he does not, nor does the Supreme Court of the United States, pass on this identical question.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the gentleman's objection, the report contains a letter from the Commissioners of the District in which they say:

> The commissioners, however, are advised by their legal officer that there is a very great doubt of the necessity for the legislation in view of the Statutes of 11 and 12 of William III, chapter 6, as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States in McCreery's Lessee v. Somerville (9 Wheat., 354); the act of Congress of March 2, 1897 (29 Stat. L., 619), made applicable to this District by an act of February 23, 1905 (33 Stat. L., 733); of the act of Congress of March 3, 1857 (24 Stat., 576); of the Maryland act of 1791 (Albert's Compilation, p. 46); and sections 396 and 960 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, all of which relate to the holding of an inheritance of land by or through aliens.

Now, if the woman has any valid claim under the statutes of the United States and under the decision of the Supreme Courts of the United States, she would not need this legislation. If this legislation is to convey to her a title which she is not able to establish at law, it seems to me Congress ought not to pass the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I might say that if I am correctly informed there is no necessity for the passage of this bill except to meet the requirements of one corporation in the District of Columbia that seems to stand higher in the District than all the laws and all the courts themselves—the company that guarantees titles. In my judgment, the title to this property is clear in these people, but no matter how good a title may be in the District of Columbia, unless this guarantee title company accepts the title in so far as getting a loan the title is absolutely worthless. This bill is intended to meet the exactions of that title company and not the requirements of the law. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I think the statement of the chairman is absolutely correct. There were two title guaranty companies in this District, and some years ago they amalgamated, or came under a common management, and now there is but one title guaranty company in the District. That company issues all the certificates of title; no abstracts are examined by lawyers in the District of Columbia, but they are required to get a certificate from this company, the only one in existence.

The only way in which that can be corrected with justice to the citizens of the District of Columbia, and with justice to the committee in Congress, is to put the registration of land titles in the District of Columbia under law and let that guaranty certificate be issued by the District of Columbia itself, and not by a private corporation that is fattening upon the condition of land titles in the District of Columbia. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LITTLEPAGE, for two days, on account of important business.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 28180, the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill, with Mr. MOON of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, before the Clerk proceeds, I desire to offer the following amendment at the point where we left the bill on Saturday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as a new paragraph, page 47, after line 2:

"Philadelphia, Pa., to connect the Delaware River with the back channel at the navy yard, with a view of securing a width and depth sufficient to accommodate the largest naval vessel afloat."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to direct attention to the very great necessity of a connection between the Delaware River and the back channel at the Philadelphia Navy Yard. The Government of the United States has a basin back of the navy yard, which is sufficient to accommodate the entire battleship fleet. An agitation is on for a dry dock, which is to extend from the Delaware River to the back channel, a distance of 1,700 feet. There is some question whether that can be accomplished through the Committee on Naval Affairs, which I understand has not favorably reported upon the project. Whatever is done here necessarily involves dredging, and as the business of the Government is involved, and this connection between the Delaware River and the back channel is necessary in order that the vessels of the Navy may swiftly and easily move, it seems proper to introduce at this time this provision for a survey that will give us an estimate of the cost of construction of a connecting link between the Delaware River and the back channel.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, did I understand the gentleman to say that the Committee on Naval Affairs had not reported this or had refused to report this?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand the Committee on Naval Affairs, which has not yet presented its report for printing, is not favorable to the project.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It is clearly a naval affair.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not necessarily. That channel should be cut through for the benefit of commerce as well as for the Navy. The Navy essentially is to protect commerce.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, yes; I understand that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And this would be incident to the proper movement of commerce, both in time of peace and in time of war.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Let me ask the gentleman another question for information. This dry dock that the gentleman speaks of, if completed, will go from the Delaware River back?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Unquestionably.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. And if that were constructed, then there would be no necessity for any other channel.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. First, we must have the channel. I want to say to the gentleman that there is very little opposition to this project on the part of Members of Congress who have already been upon the ground. A short time ago the city of Philadelphia made an appropriation for the purpose of having an inspection made of this particular project, and some 57 Congressmen, Members of this House and of the other body, went from Washington to Philadelphia to look it over, and as a result there were some speeches and a good many promises in regard to what ought to be and what would be done.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman if he did not state in the hearings before the Naval Affairs Committee that that dry dock was absolutely impracticable; that to place that dry dock there as was proposed would put it in a hole, and you could not get out on either side.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, no; the gentleman is entirely in error, and I will repeat to the gentleman the statement I did make to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Let us have that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is this: That the bill introduced to obtain a 40-foot depth for this dry dock would be building a hole in the ground that would be absolutely unnecessary, and would practically kill the meritorious part of the project. In other words, with a depth of river channel of only 30 feet, a little less than that on the inside, it would be the height of folly to dig a hole 40 feet deep when there was no necessity for it, and I said to the committee that it was my belief that some one inserted the 35-foot proposition in the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal project with a view of killing that project, and when we get back to it I want to say something about that. If the gentleman will agree with me, if he is one of those who went to Philadelphia——

Mr. TRIBBLE. I was there.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That there was the most remarkable unanimity of sentiment upon this proposition, and everybody, especially some of the leaders of this House, were entirely favorable to granting us this little bit of consideration at the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Now, the gentleman is asking for a channel to carry the largest boats of the Navy——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Is not it true the Delaware River will not convey these boats up to this point? Does the gentleman want dredging at Philadelphia——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That positively is not true; this river is dredged to-day to 30 feet and capable of accommodating the largest naval ships built, and——

Mr. TRIBBLE. You have not a sufficient depth to carry all these vessels without dredging——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is to cut through from the Delaware and dig a channel to reach the storage basin, where these——

Mr. TRIBBLE. Does the gentleman approve of the dry dock which he condemns here on the floor of the House?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not condemned the dry dock; I have approved of it; but I am asking the gentlemen upon that side to make good their promises and give this matter consideration.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Did not the gentleman oppose it in the Naval Committee, and did not the gentleman state to the Naval Committee——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not; most assuredly I did not. Now, I would like to ask the gentlemen who promised this dry dock to give it to us now; here is the opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word; I would like to ask the gentleman another question. Did not the gentleman use as an argument in the Naval Committee against that dry dock at Philadelphia that it is not a river of more than 28 feet of water?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not use that argument.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Is not that the argument the gentleman made in the hearings before the Naval Committee?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That argument is not in the hearings before the Committee on Naval Affairs, and if the gentleman wants to get a further answer to his question I think I can explain to him that some one asked me at what draft a vessel could get in that dry dock and I said 27 feet; but I say to the gentleman now we have got a 30-foot depth of the Delaware to Philadelphia, while the city of Baltimore has 35 feet and the city of New York has 40, and while the city of Boston is moving on from 35 to 40 feet, I am asking you gentlemen now, who are in control of Congress, with influential Representatives from Pennsylvania upon the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, that you loosen your control and let the city of Philadelphia move on with the other cities along the Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will be glad to do so; this is my opportunity.

Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania. Is it the gentleman's purpose in offering this amendment to kill the dry-dock proposition?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not at all. I am wholly in favor of the dry dock, and if the gentleman will vote for it, as he did not vote for the survey for the Frankford Creek, as he did not vote for the survey of the Schuylkill River, as he did not vote for dredging out the shoals behind the breakwater, I will be very much obliged to him.

Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman for that dry dock or for a channel?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am for a dry dock, but I want the channel first, because it is necessary to dig it out before you get the dry dock.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I want to ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman speaks of the delegation——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There were 57 Congressmen reported by the newspapers to have been there, and I did not report the fact.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Do you know whether any member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee made any promises on that occasion?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I remember of one or two of the most distinguished gentlemen of this House being there and speaking——

Mr. GALLAGHER. I asked if there was any member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee there.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think they are very cautious. They have been so right along. That is my trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Division, Mr. Chairman. I would like to see how many votes we can get for this meritorious project of the dry dock at Philadelphia.

The committee proceeded to divide, and the Chair announced that the ayes were 4.

Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to ask if the amendment is for the channel or dry dock.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania. I wish to call the Chair's attention to the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] made a statement that the amendment was for a dry dock.

The CHAIRMAN. The parliamentary inquiry has been answered by the reading of the Clerk. Those opposed to the amendment will rise and stand until counted.

The vote was announced as ayes 4 and noes 33.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seven gentlemen are present—a quorum—and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Big Annemessex River, Md., with a view to providing a suitable channel from Clear Creek Point to Muddy Creek Point.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent that the Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands [Mr. QUEZON] may have permission to address the House for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] asks unanimous consent that the Resident Commissioner of the Philippine Islands may have permission to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, to-day's morning papers publish a dispatch from Manila to the effect that on the 23d of January there was an engagement between the Moros on the one hand and the scouts and constabulary on the other, and in connection with this report it is stated that Aguinaldo and other Filipinos are engaged in political activities and preparing for a revolt. During the last two months, and immediately following the victory of the Democratic Party, reports of this character have been published almost daily throughout the United States, apparently with the purpose of defeating the Democratic proposition to give the Filipinos their independence, by impressing the American people with the fact that independence will be followed by a revolution in the islands.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE MORO TROUBLE.

It is my desire to comment but little upon the engagement between the Moros and the scouts and the constabulary. Nobody need be alarmed about it. Those who are familiar with what is going on in Jolo and Mindanao will find nothing new in this case. I know of no time when there was not an occasional outbreak among the Moros, except when they were under the wise and gentle hand of Gen. Wood, as governor of Mindanao. For the last two years there has been a regular warfare between the Moros and the American troops, due to an ill-considered policy of the official in charge of the Moros; but it was then to the interest of somebody to conceal this fact from the American people and no reports were therefore given out to the press about it. The explanation of this well-planned secrecy will, perhaps, be found in the following speeches delivered at Zamboanga two years ago before ex-Secretary of War Dickinson by two scarcely educated Moros:

First. "We have only a little to say, and that is that we are happy to be under the sovereignty of the Americans. There has been some talking about that the Filipinos want to tear themselves off from Americans, and that they want to tear us away too, thus tear us away with them. If the Americans should give the Moro country over to the Filipinos they would be responsible to God for the blood that would be shed, because it would be the same thing as if you put two fighting cocks into one bag, for there would be fighting sure."

Second. "* * * The Secretary of War must look the matter in the face. We are a different race; we have a different religion; we are Mohammedans, and if we should be given over to the Filipinos how much more would they treat us badly, when they have treated even the Spanish badly who were their own mothers and their own fathers in generation? How did they treat them? Think about it. Think twice. We far prefer to be in the hands of the Americans who are father and mother to us now than to be turned over to another people."

Of course, after wide circulation was given throughout the United States of these protestations of friendship and love, and they were printed even in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the warfare that followed soon afterwards between the Moros and their American "fathers and mothers" could not be given out to the press, lest the report should convey to the American people an accurate idea of the terrific manner in which a Moro shows his friendship and love. [Laughter.]

But two years have gone by. The result desired at the time has been accomplished, to wit: To show the American people that the United States was a blessing to the Moros. It is now thought that any report of disturbance in the Philippine Islands will foster the policy of retaining the islanders under American control, especially if, in connection with it, it could be said that a general revolt is being contemplated by the Filipinos, and an insignificant clash between a group of Moros and a small detachment of scouts and constabulary is promptly given to the press. This same clash, if it had happened a year ago, would not have been published, or, if it had to be published at all, would have been reported as an engagement between "police officers" and "outlaws"; now it is said to be between "American troops" and "rebels."

The whole truth about the Moro situation is this: They have never been content under their present rulers; they will be better satisfied under a Philippine government; and, at the worst, they can be governed by the Filipinos in the same way that they are governed to-day.

FALSE DISPATCHES ABOUT AGUINALDO.

But, as I said before, I do not wish to discuss at present these Moro troubles. They are not as serious to-day as they were a year ago, when nothing was said about them. What I do wish to call to the attention of the House are the malicious and absolutely false dispatches printed in the newspapers of this country about Aguinaldo and other Filipinos being engaged in revolutionary preparations.

The following is what the morning papers say on this subject, after giving an account of the Moro outbreak:

Emilio Aguinaldo, the leader of the revolt against the United States after the Spanish-American War, and who has reentered politics, is reported to be taking an active part in revolutionary propaganda. There are many rumors that the Katipunan, a Filipino secret society, is renewing its activities against the Americans. Aguinaldo has been insistent in the conferences of the native chieftains that his sole purpose in renewing his activities has been to organize them to accomplish their independence.

AGUINALDO'S POSSIBLE MOTIVE.

It is possible that Aguinaldo's real motive for his activity comes from a fear that the Jones bill, providing for Filipino independence, may not be passed, and that he is scheming to forestall control of the expected discontent of the natives.

The foregoing dispatch reads very much like the one published in the New York Sun of January 24 from its Manila correspondent, which is as follows:

(Special cable dispatch to the Sun.)

MANILA, January 23.

Aguinaldo, the infamous leader of the revolt against Americans in the Philippines, has reentered politics while all the time protesting against being interrupted in his farm work. He has frequent conferences with Filipino revolutionary committees of chieftains ostensibly for the purpose of organizing the militia preparatory to the accomplishment of independence of the islands. It is believed, however, that the real motive for the activity of Aguinaldo is an outgrowth of the fear that the Jones bill providing for Philippine independence may not be passed, and he is prompted by the desire to forestall control of the anticipated discontent among Filipinos because of the nonfulfillment of the promise of politicians.

Mr. Chairman, the statements contained in these dispatches are both false and slanderous. There are no Filipino revolutionary committees, and if there were, Aguinaldo would be the last man to connect himself with them. It is true that Aguinaldo attended the monster meeting held at Manila to celebrate Democratic victory in the United States, but so did thousands of other prominent Filipinos and some Americans. Of this meeting Justice Moreland, of the supreme court, said to me:

If the American people could have witnessed this great demonstration they would give you your independence to-morrow. It was a most impressive sight to witness such a great gathering so orderly that not even one policeman was necessary to preserve order.

Justices Carson and Trent both indorsed this view.

Gen. Aguinaldo was not one of the selected speakers, but he responded very briefly to the call made upon him for a speech. He spoke scarcely a minute, and what he said was this:

I am pleased to join you in celebrating the victory of the Democratic Party, which means to us that the day of our independence is approaching; but I wish to impress upon you that you must not depend too much upon outside influences to secure that independence. You must show the world by your actions that you are capable of governing yourselves.

WHO SENT THESE DISPATCHES.

These were almost his exact words, and yet for saying them he has been shamefully abused and misrepresented by an American correspondent of a New York newspaper, who has been guilty of conduct so outrageous that he has been driven out of office. This man is now revenging himself upon my people for exposing his conduct by sending such dispatches as these to America.

AGUINALDO'S DENIAL.

I have to-day received the following cablegram from Señor Osmeña, speaker of the Philippine Assembly, which I shall publish in the RECORD in this connection. It contains the indignant denial of Gen. Aguinaldo, who, whatever his enemies may say of him, has never been investigated for and found guilty of grafting:

MANILA, January 27, 1913.

QUEZON, Washington, D. C.:

The following from Aguinaldo: "Please deny very strongly the truth of the dispatches from Manila accusing me of political agitation preparatory to a revolt. On the contrary, I am trying to help preserve union among all elements to insure public order, which is necessary to the stability of a future Filipino government, because I am confident, and the people are also confident, that the Jones bill will be passed. I say this in spite of the possible machinations of the enemies of Philippine independence, who are said to be trying to brew all sorts of disturbances and to employ all means to prevent the passing of said bill."

OSMEÑA.

THE FILIPINO PEOPLE WILL NOT REVOLT AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say right here to the American people that the Filipinos are not preparing for revolt. They have faith in the sense of justice of the American people, and they expect to get from the generosity of the American people their freedom and independence. They will never fight the United States [applause], and much less will they fight the United States after the Democratic Party has come into power [applause], the party that is solemnly pledged to give the Philippine Islands independence. In spite of the fact that it is occasionally said that your political platforms mean nothing——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from the Philippine Islands has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from the Philippine Islands have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE FILIPINO PEOPLE BELIEVE THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY WILL GRANT THEM INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. QUEZON. In spite of the fact, I say, that we are being told that your party platforms mean nothing, we have a different conception of the great political parties of the United States. We believe that those parties stand by what they say to their people and to our people. We can not believe that your national platforms are meaningless. We believe that they are the official and responsible statements to the American people and to the world of what the party that is coming into power is going to do. [Applause.] Is it conceivable that under these conditions, believing as we do most implicitly in the promises and pledges of the Democratic Party, that my people will take up arms against the United States? What possible reason could there be for such an unnatural and suicidal course? Can any sensible American, whether he believes the Filipinos capable of self-government or not, credit these untruthful and inspired reports? Unfortunately we have learned from the saddest of experiences what armed opposition to the power of the United States means. It has cost us hundreds of thousands of lives, drenched our fair land with blood, and destroyed millions of dollars worth of property. We have, I say again, learned from a hard experience what it means to oppose with arms the forces of America.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, how many lives have been lost in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. QUEZON. Well, according to a newspaper report attributed to Gen. Bell, the present commanding general of the Philippines, in the island of Luzon alone 600,000 men, women, and children were killed during the war or died as a result thereof.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes.

Mr. DIES. You understand, of course, that in killing your people we did it for their good? [Laughter.]

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to speak of these harrowing incidents except for the purpose of convincing the House, if that be necessary, that it is impossible for us to again think of such a thing as engaging in an armed conflict with American troops, even if there were some reason for revolting against the United States, because we know too well what the result would be; such being the case, how any sane person could conceive of us revolting when there is no reason to-day for so doing—and I hope that there will never be any reason for so doing, because the administration shortly to come into power in the United States is pledged to grant the Philippines independence. I hope that if the Filipinos ever go to war they will go to war in support of the United States and not against the United States. [Applause.]

And it is very easy to accomplish this. It is very easy to make every Filipino ready to die for the American flag, if you will only heed their cry and give them what they are asking for and longing for—their independence. [Applause.]

If this is done, and the time should ever come when you should have a war in the Far East, gentlemen, you will find every man, woman, and child in my country fighting for you and for your flag. [Applause.]

[Mr. QUEZON, by unanimous consent, was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Coan River, Va., with a view to deepening and widening the channel at and near its main entrance.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, on Saturday, in discussing this bill, I referred to some examinations that I had been connected with the making of, and based a statement on that that I had no confidence in the engineers' reports after the committee cited me to these volumes of the engineers' reports for information on that subject. In that statement I made reference to some statements made before the Committee on Insular Affairs with reference to Benguet Road. This morning I got a letter from Col. McIntyre correcting some statements that I had made with reference to the Benguet Road. It was my impression that the Army engineers made the estimate on that road, estimating that it would cost $75,000 when in fact it cost over $2,000,000. They inform me that it was not an Army engineer who made that estimate and report, but that it was an ordinary civilian; that the Army engineers went ahead and carried out the work.

There is one further thing to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. On Saturday I made the statement that the road was 10 or 12 miles long. This letter from the Army engineer tells me that it is 30 miles long. I want to cite the hearings on that question. When Mr. QUEZON was testifying before the Committee on Insular Affairs he made the statement that it was 10 or 12 miles long. I read from the record of the Committee hearing, February, 1912:

Mr. HELM. How long is the road?

Mr. QUEZON. The Benguet Road is about 10 or 12 miles—the colonel will be able to tell you.

The CHAIRMAN. How far is it from Camp 1 to Baguio?

Mr. QUEZON. I think that is about 10 or 12 miles.

Mr. HELM. Is that where the $2,000,000 was spent?

Mr. QUEZON. Pretty nearly.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Is there any tunneling on the road?

Mr. QUEZON. No, sir.

Col. McIntyre was at that time sitting at the table, and Gen. Edwards was in the room, and they made no contrary statement. This letter states that the road was about 30 miles long.

I based my statement that it was 10 or 12 miles long on the fact that the statements which I have read were made before the Insular Affairs Committee in the presence not only of Col. McIntyre, but of Gen. Edwards.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will not object now, but I give notice that I shall object to any further extension, because this is entirely irrelevant to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, the relevancy of this will appear before I conclude. I call attention to another report of engineers on which this House acted, expending $540,000 in Arizona on the Pima Indian Reservation, on the Gila River. The expenditure was made on a Government engineer's report in the Indian service.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. These appropriations were not reported through the River and Harbor Committee, were they?

Mr. CALLAWAY. No; but I am talking about engineers generally. There was an investigating committee went down to examine this project last summer. The Indian Bureau knew that; they made a report before the Indian Affairs Committee, on which they asked the Indian Affairs Committee to appropriate $20,000 for the maintenance and operation of that project. On December 2 they stated as follows before that committee:

The number of Indians on the reservation is 4,246; the land now irrigated on the reservation, 12,000 acres.

There is not an acre irrigated by these wells of which they are speaking and asking for this $20,000 to maintain and operate.

Land to be supplied with pumped water, 12,000 acres.

And the Indians under that project refused to accept that water. They told the Government before it ever started that expenditure that they would not accept it; that it would kill the land; and they never have accepted it, and this Government has no power to make them accept it. But notwithstanding the facts, notwithstanding their knowledge that this committee made this investigation last summer, they had the unbridled effrontery to ask an additional appropriation of $20,000.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Who was that engineer?

Mr. CALLAWAY. This comes from the Indian Bureau and the Reclamation Service. Mr. W. H. Code was the original engineer.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. A United States Army engineer?

Mr. CALLAWAY. No; other kind of engineers. They all look alike to me.

Now, I was cited by this committee—and that is what I want to get down to—to the engineers' report, to which they look for information and guidance in appropriating $40,000,000 of the public money. Their bill cites this little pamphlet, containing 262 pages, and I am going to read the back of it:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers' reports of the survey of the Boston (Mass.)-Beaufort (N. C.) section of the proposed inland waterway, from Boston, Mass., to the Rio Grande River.

On this end of the project from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C., which is about 100 miles, they say it will cost ultimately $5,400,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have stated to the committee these things to show them what the estimates of the engineers working for the Government are worth when it comes to final work. The estimate on this canal from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C., is $5,400,000. That is the initial step in this intercoastal canal, running from Boston, Mass., to the Rio Grande, the ultimate cost of which God Almighty only knows.

In this bill, Mr. Chairman, there is this provision:

Provided, That no part of this amount shall be expended until the canal and appurtenant property belonging to the Chesapeake & Albemarle Canal Co. shall have been acquired by the United States by purchase in accordance with the agreement entered into between the Secretary of War and said company under date of February 17, 1912.

That is this pamphlet here, and they now appropriate $800,000—this initial step in a waterway, the end of which no man born of woman can see. This is the point I make to this House and to the people of the United States, that a chain is no stronger than its weakest link. This proposition is as rotten, from the standard of statesmanship or profit, so far as the American people is concerned, as anything that was ever devised by the mind of man. This proposition is the substructure on which the whole bill stands, and is the standard by which it should be measured. In this bill we are asked to appropriate $800,000 as the initial step in this intercoastal waterway for this particular segment, which is only 100 miles long, and, according to the engineer's estimate, will cost to complete $5,400,000. This is a 100-mile segment of an intercoastal canal 2,500 miles long.

The Clerk read as follows:

Inland waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C., with a view to determining whether there should be any change in that part of the route from Alligator River southwardly to Neuse River from that heretofore recommended in House Document No. 301, Sixty-second Congress, second session, and heretofore adopted, and whether it would be desirable to extend the route from Alligator River to Pungo River, thence to Goose Creek, thence from the head of Goose Creek to Jones Bay, and thence to Neuse River, or whether any modification of said part of the route is desirable.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been cited by the chairman of this committee to 4,000 pages of stuff that he says if I am patriotic enough and energetic enough to search through I can find the reason why this committee has brought in this bill.

I have not been able to search these 4,000 pages of stuff, but I have looked at these engineers' reports, Mr. Chairman, and I do not find that these engineers give any estimate of what the present waterways carry, or what the increased tonnage will be if there is a change as proposed in this bill, nor what the difference in freight charges for such carriage will be if the changes are made as proposed in this bill.

There is not a man that has got any business sense, from Kalamazoo to kingdom come, whose estimate of a project is worth a cent unless the estimate shows what it will be when constructed, what it will cost in construction, what the maintenance charges are to be, and what the income will be from the project when completed. That is enough to beat any project. But there is another question that ought to enter in here, and that is what particular section will this benefit—whether the whole people of the United States are to be benefited by it. There is no effort to show on the part of these engineers what any of these projects will be worth to the country at large and what the difference in tonnage carried will be. They do not even state the mileage in many instances.

Mr. Chairman, I have never thought anything better of the Republicans, I have never hoped for anything better of them, and I do not think this country at large has expected anything better of them; but we as Democrats came in here on an economy platform and the reduction of expenditures. Here is a bill that increases the expenditures for rivers and harbors almost 50 per cent. The bill carries $40,000,000. The committee in its reports says that is $14,000,000 more than last year. That does not look to me like Democratic economy. Then they come in here on the reports of the same engineers that furnished the data to the Republicans, on which they based their expenditures from year to year. This Democratic House is led by the same bunch of heads of departments and engineers under their charge that the Republicans were led by, that led them to the slaughter of 1910 and into the ignominious defeat of 1912; and if the Democratic Party follows this pork-barrel system the Republicans followed, led by the engineers who are interested in feathering their own nests and furthering their own interests, then the Democratic Party will come to the same bad end that the Republican Party came to.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Is the gentleman opposed to the item in the bill which he is discussing, namely, an inland waterway from Boston to the Rio Grande?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to every item in this bill except the items to keep in preservation the projects we now have. Everybody in this country but Congressmen in this House knows that the waterways have played out; that transportation has quit going by the water route; that the railways are carrying the freights. This committee had the charge flung in their faces on Saturday that every ton of freight that the Mississippi carried last year cost this Government $30.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Is the gentleman in favor, then, of discontinuing that portion of this inland waterway which extends from Sabine to the Rio Grande?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes. I am opposed to every segment of this intercoastal waterway.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have before me the hearings of the Naval Committee, and I want to do the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] absolute fairness and justice. The question under discussion before the Naval Committee at the time to which I refer was the 28-foot channel, and it was not contradicted that the Delaware River did not have over 28 feet. Here is the testimony of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]:

The CHAIRMAN. I understood that you have a mean low water of 30 feet.

Mr. MOORE. We have a rise in the tide there of 7 feet.

It will be noticed that there is a rise in the tide there. Continuing:

Our mean low water now exists—

But he did not say how much. He takes a very mild position on that—

It is legislatively now 30 feet, and it is substantially—

Substantially. He does not assert that it is 30 feet—substantially 30 feet all the way up for 60 miles.

Here is the particular issue that came before the Naval Affairs Committee, and is up before the House here to-day. I read from the hearings the exact language of the gentleman:

There is probably not more than 20 or 25 feet of depth, and in the upper end it was shown that they did not have 30 feet, so that the cutting of a canal to 35 feet seems an absurdity——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To what does that refer?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I am reading what the gentleman from Pennsylvania said.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does that refer to the Delaware River or to the back channel?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Wait until I get through.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I insist that the gentleman confine his remarks to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida makes the point of order that the gentleman from Georgia is not confining his remarks either to the amendment, to the amendment to the amendment, or to the paragraph. The point of order is sustained. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] be permitted to read what he was stating to the House regarding the hearings in which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] was involved, subject matter that has been discussed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania upon this floor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman should read into the RECORD exactly what is in that statement and not take it by piecemeal, because I stand on that statement.

Mr. HEFLIN. I hope the time will be granted to my colleague.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I only want about three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will publish the entire statement I will not object, but if he is not going to publish the entire statement, I will.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will read every word in it—one-fourth of a page of the hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. TRIBBLE (reading)—

* * * We would have a hole in the ground, which would mean that if you ever built a vessel in there drawing 35 feet it could not get out and would simply have to pass between Chesapeake Bay and Delaware Bay and stay there * * *.

That is exactly what I said here.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. TRIBBLE (reading)—

* * * The difficulty with the bill of Mr. LEE, which contemplates opening up the entire enterprise at once, is that if you make the depth and width of this 1,700 feet to correspond with the depth and width of the Panama Canal you will dig a hole in the ground between the Delaware River and the Schuylkill River out of which you can not get at all. It would seem to be——

Mr. DONOHOE (interposing). Any vessel that got in should certainly be able to get out.

Mr. MOORE. That is true; but I do not understand the necessity of digging 10 feet below the river depths.

Mr. DONOHOE. The further deepening of the Delaware River is certainly in contemplation.

Mr. MOORE. Yes, sir; we are trying to get 35 feet.

Mr. DONOHOE. We do not know what depth we may have to go in the future; it will be limited only by the size of the ships?

Mr. MOORE. That is true.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. LEE's bill proposes to construct the dry dock corresponding with the depth of locks of the Panama Canal, which will limit the width and depth of ships in the future; and so if we build it properly now we will not have to rebuild it in the future?

Mr. MOORE. That argument would go if you could get up the Delaware River and out the Back Basin.

Mr. DONOHOE. It would do no harm?

Mr. MOORE. No, sir; it would do no harm; but there are 60 miles of channel that do not now exceed 30 feet, and therefore you would simply be digging a 40-foot hole 1,700 feet long to connect two bodies of water not more than 30 feet deep.

Mr. DONOHOE. That would have to be taken up in the future if we did not get it deep enough now.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BUTLER. What size vessels can go up there?

Mr. MCCREARY. The mean depth is about 29 feet.

Mr. MOORE. Any war vessel the Government has can go up there.

Mr. BUTLER. I mean can it go up there?

Mr. MOORE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I understood that you have at mean low water 30 feet?

Mr. MOORE. We have a rise in the tide there of 7 feet. Our mean low water now exceeds 28 feet. It is legislatively 30 feet and is substantially 30 feet all the way up the 60 miles.

Mr. GREGG. What is the length of the dry dock you have there?

Mr. MOORE. About 750 feet—to be exact, 744.6⅞ over all. The Utah, built across the river by the New York Shipbuilding Co., is one of the very largest vessels the Government has thus far built. She is one of the new Dreadnoughts, and she has been in the dock.

* * * * * * *

* * * The question is the construction of a new dry dock. We have a dry dock at Philadelphia about 750 feet long. It is not the biggest dry dock in the United States, but it is an excellent dry dock. It was capable of housing the dreadnought Utah and did it very well, but there is some difference of opinion as to the possible capacity in the matter of the entrance at the caisson for the admission of such vessels as may be constructed in the near future.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the gentleman is not reading the statement in full, as the gentleman agreed to do, but he is reading page by page and skipping as he goes along. If the gentleman will consent that I have just five minutes to answer him after he is through, he can make as many extracts as he pleases.

Mr. TRIBBLE. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I shall ask for five minutes to show the gentleman's position before the Committee on Naval Affairs. He is asking for an 800-foot dry dock. He has a 750-foot dry dock there now. He seeks another 800 feet. Mr. LEE is pressing his bill for 1,700——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of the gentleman from Georgia, I will state I am not going to object to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania; consent has been granted on this side. Now the gentleman from Georgia asks for five minutes on this side. I shall object then to any further discussion.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I think it is come to a time now that we should close up this bill. It has been pending for several days. I dislike to be discourteous to anyone, but I am on this committee, and we are tired of this matter, and therefore I demand the regular order, and I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Beaufort Harbor, N. C., with a view to providing a suitable turning basin and anchorage area in front of the town or Beaufort.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last paragraph. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DAVIDSON] asked me awhile ago if I was not in favor of the digging of an intercoastal canal along that southern coast of Texas.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not discussing his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The gentleman can proceed in order.

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman want on this subject?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Oh, I just want a few minutes, 5 minutes or 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has been——

Mr. CALLAWAY. I will yield. I desire to conform to the rules of the House; I do not want to ask any favors.

Mr. MANN. It is not a matter of favor. Let us arrange, if we can——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, unless I am mistaken, we will reach the point after a little while, when we will return to certain pages and lines passed over, and where the discussion that the gentleman is going through with now will, perhaps, be in order.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, here is the item from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort, N. C. I was talking about an intercoastal waterway that runs to Beaufort, N. C., from Norfolk, Va. This is the initial project and part of the same system designed to run finally around to the Gulf of Mexico and the Rio Grande River, providing this Nation lives long enough and the United States Treasury holds out. I was asked by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DAVIDSON] about that part of it running along the southern coast of Texas.

If I were a pork-barrel politician, here to get my hands into the Treasury, I would favor that section along the coast of Texas and submit to the whole project, Mr. Chairman, not because it would help the people of the State of Texas, not because the people of Texas would generally get any due return on the money expended, but because the money would be spent in Galveston, Houston, and Beaumont; because they would employ men to work who would spend the money at the saloons, grocery stores, and dry-goods establishments, and ride on the railways and the street cars, buy electric lights, and so forth. If this money was taken out of the Federal Treasury and given out in equal amounts to the individuals of Texas, Texas would be more benefited than burdened, but the whole people of the United States would not. That is the reason, if I was a pork-barrel politician, I would favor the Gulf coast section. That is the way the Republicans did. We opposed that system. We came in saying we were going to economize public expenditures, but we invited the same heads of departments to make recommendations and the same engineers to give reports, and went on doling out appropriations in the same way the Republicans had been doling them out. You ask me how much of this I am against. I see here, on the second page of this voluminous report of two pages, that the maintenance items total $2,222,650. The Democrats ought to appropriate that; evidently what we have is worth maintaining, but we ought not to expend one cent more unless it is conclusively shown to be a good business investment, such as an individual would make for himself.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman believe that on this subject we ought to follow the Democratic platform's declarations?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes; I believe we ought to follow the Democratic platform's declarations honestly and wisely——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clearwater Harbor and Little Pass, Fla., with a view to securing a channel with suitable depth and width from the Gulf of Mexico to a point at or near the town of Clearwater.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 40, line 17, strike out the word "Little" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Big."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Florida desire to address the committee?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALLAWAY. If we have reached the clear water on the Gulf of Mexico, line 19, page 49, I vote to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. We have reached it. Now is the time.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, what I want to call the committee's attention to is what seems to be a part of this same canal proposition.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It has nothing to do with the intercoastal waterway or any part of the intercoastal waterway.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I can not understand how a harbor would reach clear water if you would not have to go inland in order to reach clear water, and this intercoastal waterway is the only proposition in this bill that would reach clear water, I believe.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I say it kindly, but it only demonstrates the fact that the gentleman is totally unacquainted with the subject he is trying to discuss. I hope he will pardon the statement, because I say it in all kindness.

Mr. CALLAWAY. You have my pardon.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If the gentleman from Texas will take the time to read, not the 4,000 pages that he refers to there, but that smaller document that he has before him there, the title of which he called our attention to a while ago, he will find that the intercoastal waterway does not touch Clearwater Harbor at all; that starting in somewhere about Boston and going down the coast——

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to know if the gentleman is speaking in my time or in his.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I was trying to inform the gentleman, assuming that he wants information.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALLAWAY. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that I read this thing, which is the report of the Army Engineers on the intercoastal waterway project, and that is the thing that made me mad. [Laughter.] That is the thing that has made me lose confidence in the judgment of the committee. That is the thing that has made me question every item in this bill. That is the thing that has put me "on the warpath," and I propose to stay on it as long as this committee brings into the House such propositions as this and asks that the public money be expended on such unheard-of propositions.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Has the gentleman read everything in that report?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes; I have read everything in that report. I put in Saturday night and all day Sunday, Sunday night, and Monday morning reading it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Then, if the gentleman has read everything in that report, I can not account for his anger except on the theory that the engineers have turned down so much of the project, because they have actually reported adversely everything in it except a very few links in the chain.

Mr. CALLAWAY. They have advised a project that runs along the coast from Boston to the Rio Grande River.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALLAWAY. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the title of the document the gentleman refers to?

Mr. CALLAWAY. "Tidal Waterway from Boston, Mass., to Beaufort, S. C."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is it.

Mr. CALLAWAY. "Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the Engineers on the proposed inland waterway running from Boston, Mass., to the Rio Grande River."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is sufficient. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know something about this intercoastal waterway, having gone from one end of it along the Atlantic coast to the other, and I wish to say that I wish the gentleman would differentiate the Atlantic from the Gulf project; that he will disassociate the project from Boston to Beaufort from the project that runs through the State of Florida, along the Gulf of Mexico, and into the State of Texas. That is an entirely different project.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. EDWARDS. I object, Mr. Chairman. We must finish this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am sorry for the gentleman from Texas. I think he should have more time.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Never mind; I will jump on the next paragraph. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Harbor at Tampa, Fla., with a view to securing increased depth and width in the channel from the Gulf of Mexico through Tampa and Hillsboro Bays to the head of the estuary in the city of Tampa.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I was about to say that it is fair for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] to criticize the intercoastal waterway if he does not approve the project, but he should differentiate the project as reported on by the engineers, running from Massachusetts to Beaufort, N. C., from this project which the committee has reported. The intraconstal waterway, so called, mentioned in this report has nothing whatever to do with the project that runs across the State of Florida and into the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman from Texas to say that the reading of the report of the intercoastal waterway from Boston to Beaufort somewhat excited his ire. Does the gentleman think he will be able to read the report at all on the project from Beaufort to the Rio Grande, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania intimates is a great deal worse? [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for one statement there? Bear in mind that the engineers have reported only upon the section which is described in the report which the gentleman has in his hand. There has been no report yet on the project below Beaufort, nor in Florida, nor along the Gulf of Mexico, so far as I am informed.

Mr. CALLAWAY. In answer to the gentleman's statement I will say that I read this report, which reports on a segment of that canal which they recommend, based on the proposition that ultimately the canal is to be dug from Boston, Mass., to the Rio Grande. That is what I am talking about. That is the only way this report can be considered. You can not consider this matter in segments. It is not made by the engineers for consideration in segments. This segment is reported on by the engineers with the view ultimately of building it from Boston, Mass., to the Rio Grande, and no sensible man can consider it any other way than as a whole canal.

Now, I am wise enough to know that they are going to pick the best segments first, and when they get a segment here and a segment there and a segment yonder that are the least expensive and the most plausible for a beginning they will insist that these segments must be joined in order to make the project complete and valuable. I am wise enough to know another thing, that the people of this country are wise enough to know—that is the way you will do it. If you were wise, you would stop this thing here at its initial point—not begin it. The people of this country will hold you responsible, and they ought to do it. The people understand this pork-barrel business, and it is a matter of ridicule all over the country, except at places where the money is spent.

The money goes to the saloons, groceries, and dry goods houses from the contractors and people who do the work. They are interested in it. They do not care what becomes of the Government or how they burden the people. The question with them is to feather their own nests and further their own interests. And these engineers are the same way. Why, I have a cousin by marriage who is an engineer working in this river and harbor business, and I saw his wife last winter. They are good people. I love them. The man is smart and educated. Something came up about rivers and harbors, and his wife said she hoped I would vote for the biggest appropriation that is offered for rivers and harbors, because "that will help our job."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I would like two minutes more. If you will extend my time two minutes, I will give you a rest and go to lunch.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The remark made by that man's wife was natural and human. This House ought to know these engineers are interested not only in furthering their own interests and holding their own jobs and raising their salaries, but they are interested in getting particular friends of theirs into places all along the line. That is human and natural, and the commercial spirit has been cultivated until every man holding a job under the Government looks at the improving of it as a business; he thinks about it as a business, not from the standpoint of the welfare of the whole people or the country.

Then we base our bills on engineers' reports. This report says they did not do all that the engineers asked them to do; that the engineers reported on 170 different projects, and the committee have only taken 60 out of the 170, and that they only recommended 70 for them to look into for another year, and that was all. Where, in heaven's name, is the matter going to stop?

A statement was made on the floor of the House Saturday, which I presume is true—I have not heard a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee deny it—that every ton of freight floated on the Mississippi River last year cost the Government $30. I will say further that I have not heard any member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee give one single reason that looked either statesmanlike, sound financially, or sensible for the passage of this bill. I have heard no Member deny what the gentleman said—that every ton of freight that went on the Mississippi River cost the people of this country $30. Is that true? That is the greatest inland waterway of the country; that is the biggest river in the whole business. He said not only that, but that the Mississippi River did not carry one-half the tonnage now that it carried 20 years ago. That shows that your work on the Mississippi River "to improve commerce and navigation" has not added to the tonnage. It shows that river and canal commerce is doomed. The railways have superseded them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FINLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 380. Joint resolution authorizing the granting of permits to the Committee on Inauguration of the President-elect on March 4, 1913, etc.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6380) to incorporate the American Hospital of Paris.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 26080) making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. WETMORE, and Mr. FOSTER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 33.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there shall be printed and bound in cloth, with accompanying maps, 4,000 copies of the Report Upon Panama Canal Traffic and Tolls, prepared for the President by Emory R. Johnson, special commissioner on traffic and tolls; that the copies here ordered shall be printed from plates recently prepared for the Isthmian Canal Commission and now in the possession of the Government Printing Office, and that of the copies printed 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 for the use of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ochlockonee and Crooked River, Fla.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 50, between lines 1 and 2, insert the following: "Crooked Channel, Fla."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mobile Harbor and bar, Alabama, with a view to securing such additional depth and width of channel as the interests of commerce may require.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question for information. Who controls the piers or wharfage in Mobile Harbor? Are they controlled by the railroad companies or by the city of Mobile?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am not fully advised on that subject, but I will say to the gentleman that I am under the impression that the railroad companies do not control them. They may own their own dock facilities; very likely they do. I am not advised as to that.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to ask another question in that connection, and that is, While the Engineers are ascertaining the desirability of these improvements and the probable cost, would it not be well to ascertain also who owns the piers and wharfage of Mobile?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say to the gentleman that I think that a very pertinent inquiry. In the river and harbor bill of last year there was carried a provision authorizing an examination and such inquiries as will bring that information. We have not the reports in yet, but when they come in I dare say we will have full information on all those subjects.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, Mr. Chairman, while we are considering this matter and making large appropriations for improvement of harbors, I think it would be well to know whether we are appropriating and expending this money to build up the railroad properties of the country or whether we are expending it for the purpose of improving waterways belonging to all the people.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. That proposition was carried in the bill of last year. The engineers, under the directions in that bill, are getting up the very data that the gentleman is now referring to.

Mr. CULLOP. I understand, Mr. Chairman, in the testimony taken in the hearings before a number of committees, very large volumes of it, that nearly the entire wharfage or piers in every great harbor in this country is monopolized as terminal facilities by the great railways of the country.

I want to ask the gentleman and Members of this House whether it is right to go into the pockets of the people and appropriate their money to build up the private property of these great corporations? It is undoubtedly a fact that in many of the harbors of this country the piers and landing places are so controlled by the great railways of the country that a ship not controlled by these companies can not land at a single pier. Does the gentleman from Florida believe that he in his official capacity is doing justice to the American taxpayer when he is going into their pockets and taking millions simply to improve the property of these great corporations who hold a monopoly in their terminal facilities along these great highways of commerce which belong to the people?

The docks at these great points of commerce should be preserved for the benefit of the public and not turned over to the control of private enterprise and then employed for the purpose or restricting commerce. This evil which I am calling attention to exists in many places as a public detriment and very injurious to the commerce of the country, and a speedy remedy should be furnished for it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that his remarks are timely and pertinent. At the same time the evil of which he complains has not gone, perhaps, to the extent he thinks it has. At all events we are taking steps to remedy it.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. As soon as I have finished. There is no doubt but that in some, yes, in many places in the country railroads have had control if not of the entire dock facilities, at least a large part of them. In some places they owned them, in others they controlled without owning them. But a few years ago the River and Harbor Committee began to make inquiries into the subject and we have set on foot investigations that will give us the information upon which we can legislate wisely on the subject and correct the evil.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption at that point?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. The testimony before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in a number of instances has shown that at some of our greatest shipping points certain railroad terminals have obtained possession of the entire frontage of the waterway and simply control the landing and the handling of all the commerce at such places. I am informed that testimony of that character has recently been given—but is not yet published—before the Committee on Fisheries and Merchant Marine regarding this same harbor.

Mr. SPARKMAN. To which harbor does the gentleman refer?

Mr. CULLOP. To the one at Mobile. I am informed that testimony is not yet published, but that it has been given by witnesses who claim to have possession of the facts, and that they say that the terminal facilities of railroads practically control the piers and the wharfage in that city. I will say this, that if they do not do it in Mobile, then that city stands alone almost in that regard in this country. They have been wise and have built wisely in that respect, by obtaining possession and control of those facilities simply for the purpose dominating the commerce at such points. It has been very clearly demonstrated that in certain of our larger cities in the East these facilities are absolutely controlled by the railroad terminals.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that he is largely correct, at least so far as quite a number of the harbors are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think this a very important question.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman admits the importance of the question, and that we ought not to take the public money to improve the property of these corporations.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I fully agree with the gentleman in that.

Mr. CULLOP. There is no justification for it, he admits. Now, I will ask him if in certain harbors along the Atlantic coast where this is true any appropriations have been provided for in this bill to be expended for the improvement of them solely to advance the value of the private property of these corporations? If so, does not the gentleman believe that he ought to return to those items and have them eliminated from the bill?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to answer that question, and I will answer it by saying that I know of no harbor for which we are making an appropriation in this bill the terminal facilities of which are entirely owned or controlled by railroads. I know of no harbor where they own any very considerable part of the terminal facilities, except at places where efforts are now being made, successful efforts, too, to correct the evil. Municipalities in many places are acquiring a sufficiency of dock facilities to control the situation. Let us take the city of Jacksonville, Fla., for instance. There railroads and private parties did gain control of nearly all the frontage on the river; but that city, seeing the need of municipally owned docks, has authorized the issue of bonds and will at great expense—nearly a million of dollars—provide sufficient dock facilities to take care of her rapidly growing commerce. Other cities are doing likewise. This is true at Philadelphia, as I understand; it is also true in New York, where they propose to spend many millions of dollars for similar purposes; and, as I said a moment ago, I know of no place for which we are making the appropriations in this bill where the wharfage property and other terminal facilities are entirely controlled by railroads. I think all harbors and rivers improved by the Government should be open to all on equal terms; and if we go ahead as we are going now the time is not far distant, I take it, when we will have reached a point where no appropriation will be made by Congress for the improvement of a river or for the development of a harbor unless ample dock and terminal facilities are provided for such harbor or river free and open to general commerce. [Applause.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 50, at the end of line 6, by adding the following: "Provided, That the report thereon shall disclose the ownership and control of the wharves, docks, and piers in said harbor."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I feel, in view of the disclosures which have been made in reference to the ownership of these conveniences in this harbor, that it would be proper and just to the American people that the report on this project should disclose the ownership of the wharves, docks, and piers of this harbor. It has been said here, with some degree of earnestness and also with some degree of authority, that the railroads have a complete control of the approaches to these docks, wharves, and piers. If that be true, Mr. Chairman, I feel that it would be unwise for the Government to make great outlays in the way of expenditures of money for the purpose of improving private property for the benefit of private corporations. I trust, Mr. Chairman, in view of the statements which have been made by members of the committee upon this question, that this amendment will carry. I see no reason why it should not carry; I see no reason why this investigation should not disclose to the American people in its report who are the owners of these approaches for the purpose of commerce, and give to us the advantages of the information concerning the ownership of railroads of such private ownership. I do not know what the committee may think of it, but I see no reason why they should not agree to such an amendment. In fact, I say, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly.

Mr. EDWARDS. Does not the gentleman know that the very provision which he seeks to put in by amendment is now the law?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I know, to the contrary, that if there is a syllable of information in any report made by any investigation of any of these harbors disclosing the ownership and control of these approaches I have no knowledge of it; and I say to the gentleman who propounded that question that he can not make good his statement, making it clear that there is a report or any investigation made disclosing these facts.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. The gentleman is now offering an amendment in regard to Mobile Harbor?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I say to the gentleman that the last report on Mobile Harbor, which I think is No. 967, in which this harbor was reported, gives the mileage and the ownership of every particle of wharfage there is in that situation. [Applause.] Now, I want to say further to the gentleman that if he will read he will find in the last river and harbor bill, and it now becomes the general law, that the engineers are required to make report as to the ownership of wharfage in a city when further improvements are sought to be made. I simply want to give the gentleman that information along the line of his present discussion.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt whatever the distinguished gentleman from Alabama is anxious to get at the information which I seek by this amendment, but I repeat that I have never seen a report from any of these investigating engineers disclosing the information which this amendment seeks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, so far as the harbor of Mobile is concerned full information was given to this Congress three years ago when the last project was adopted extending the depth of Mobile Harbor to 27 feet, in House Document 657, Sixty-first Congress, second session. Information was given as to the wharves in that locality. Since that time, within the last two or three years——

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I think I will answer the gentleman's question as I proceed, but I will be glad to answer it now.

Mr. FOWLER. Does that report disclose that the railroads have any interest in wharves, piers, and docks, in the harbor of Mobile?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. That report discloses that the Mobile & Ohio, Southern, Louisville & Nashville, and Mobile, Jackson & Kansas City Railroads have considerable terminal facilities in Mobile.

Mr. FOWLER. Does it disclose it has an interest in all the docks and piers of that harbor?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. On the contrary, it discloses it has the interests not only of docking and wharfage, which has not yet been made into important——

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that this railroad has almost the exclusive right in that harbor to the approach of the piers, docks, and wharves?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I do not think it is almost an exclusive right. It has at the present time, I think, the largest single wharf frontage. If the gentleman will allow me to give him the information on the subject, I will be glad to do so.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there not complaint now of the crowding out of others in that harbor, and that they can not get there to discharge the duties which devolve upon them now, because of the fact of this railroad's ownership of piers and docks in that harbor?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Is that question stated as fully as you desire to put it?

Mr. FOWLER. For the present.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. My answer to that is that the Turner-Hartwell Dock Co. owns a splendid dock, with the latest modern improvements upon it, and which is a very large and comprehensive one. That dock is on the wharf front in Mobile, but it happens to be along the line of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad and not along the line of the Mobile & Ohio Railroad. The latter railroad and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad do not discharge their freight at the same places in the city of Mobile, nor do they discharge their freight from the same terminal.

Mr. FOWLER. Does not this——

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Let me answer it.

Mr. FOWLER. I thought you had answered it fully.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I have not. The Turner-Hartwell Dock Co. claim the Mobile & Ohio Railroad ought to absorb certain switching charges on freight that is shipped to them and directed to them on the way to Europe and elsewhere. The Mobile & Ohio Railroad Co. contend they ought not to be called upon to absorb the switching charges. That question has been before the Interstate Commerce Commission for two years or more—the question between the Turner-Hartwell Dock Co. and the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Co.

Mr. FOWLER. Does not this Mobile & Ohio Railroad Co. control that great frontage there of easy approach to that harbor?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. A part of it.

Mr. FOWLER. And the greatest part to the deep channel?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I do not think it does control the greatest part.

Mr. FOWLER. I have been so informed, and that is the object of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR] has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move an extension of his time for five minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed and clear this situation up, if I can, without interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR] will proceed for five minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. The Turner-Hartwell Dock Co. is represented largely by Horace Turner, of Mobile, who is one of the most progressive men in the United States; certainly one of the most progressive men in Alabama and throughout the South. He wants—instead of what we have in Mobile now, 300-feet bottom width in our channel—a bottom width of 1,200 or 1,500 feet in our river channel. He will be greatly surprised to hear that the controversy between the Mobile & Ohio Railroad and the Turner-Hartwell Dock Co. could have impressed the mind of any man, far less a Member of Congress, with the view that he has interposed, or desires to interpose, or that there ought to be any interruption in the development and deepening of the channel at Mobile by the United States. Now, this call for another survey is pressed more vigorously by the Turner-Hartwell Dock Co., perhaps, and those who take their view of the situation, than probably any other business interests in Mobile. They are settling their controversy as well as they are able to do before the Interstate Commerce Commission. In addition to that the public of Mobile are now being very much agitated and are exceedingly interested, as am I and as is every citizen in the State of Alabama, in the development of a belt-line railroad similar to that in New Orleans. We do not know whether we can obtain it or not, but we are agitating the question now, and that is for the purpose of improving the dock facilities at the city of Mobile so as to keep pace with the growth of commerce and the development of our channel and harbor at Mobile.

I can not recollect the number of yards or the number of feet or the exact capacity of the different docks in Mobile, but I am quite safe in saying that I do not think the Mobile & Ohio Railroad owns a controlling interest in our wharf and frontage. The trouble between them, and the dispute between them, is not a question as to the amount of dockage or wharf frontage.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Yes; I would be very glad to.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Section 3, containing the legislative provisions in this bill, seems to cover this whole question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It requires every report to contain information respecting both public and private terminals and transport facilities, and to report especially respecting the public docks and wharves; and if there be none, on their inadequacy. The report must contain the opinion of the local engineer respecting the number and the location. It seems to me this whole question is covered by section 3 on page 53 of the bill—is covered as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] would require.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Yes; I stated that, and the gentleman from Illinois stated that it was not so. He disputed the fact.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think it is so.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Does that law that the gentleman refers to, and to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has just referred, require that there shall be in the report on every one of these surveys of harbors a statement of the ownership of the wharves and the piers and the docks and the control thereof?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I think so, as nearly as the English language can make it.

Mr. FOWLER. I have never seen it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Look at it, on page 53 of this bill, the particular bill that the gentleman has before him, or, if the gentleman desires, I will read it to him. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has repeated an abstract of it to him.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; but he has not repeated what this amendment calls for, and I do not think the gentleman from Alabama can.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I will only read what is here, and this is made to cover all authorities for surveys. But I replied to the gentleman from Illinois as to this particular point in Mobile that such report had already been done in the last survey, as required by law.

Mr. FOWLER. If this amendment should carry, it would prevent the Mobile & Ohio Railroad from controlling commerce from that port to the Panama Canal, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. No; I do not know it. I have nothing to do with the Mobile & Ohio Railroad, but I do not believe in legislation on a river and harbor bill to control a question of interstate and foreign commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the discussion between the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] and myself was left in a rather unsatisfactory condition, and in order not to take up the time of the House I ask unanimous consent that the full statement made by me as to the navy yard before the Committee on Naval Affairs be inserted in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HEFLIN). The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a statement concerning the controversy he had with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] with reference to the hearing before the Committee on Naval Affairs. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

NEW DRY DOCK AT PHILADELPHIA NAVY YARD.

Argument of Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE, Member of Congress, before the House Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there has been a custom for several years, certainly since I have been in Congress, to come before the committee and present the claims of the Philadelphia Navy Yard. This year we are in a somewhat different position as a delegation in that we have two members of what was once the minority party, now the majority party in Congress, very closely associated with this work. Mr. DONOHOE, of Philadelphia, is a Democrat. We have not had the pleasure of having a Democrat with us for several years, and Mr. LEE, a member of the Democratic Party, is a member of this committee.

Mr. DONOHOE. Is it a pleasure?

Mr. MOORE. A very great pleasure [laughter], because it drives us all forward to do the best that is in us.

I think there is no division of sentiment in regard to what we would like to have done for the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

The CHAIRMAN. We never have any politics in this committee.

Mr. MOORE. I understand that this committee is a semijudicial body and will treat us fairly without regard to our party relations. Mr. DONOHOE, of course, will speak for himself, but on behalf of Gen. Bingham, Mr. MCCREARY, Mr. MOON, Mr. REYBURN, and the other members of the delegation I desire to ask the committee to be as considerate of the Philadelphia Navy Yard as possible, more particularly since this year there has been a cut in the estimates from $160,000 to $140,000. We ask that every one of the items presented in the estimates be approved in full. They consist of the sanitation system, reserve basin, to complete, $45,000; Pier No. 5, to extend, $85,000; and water-closets, $10,000. A previous act provided an appropriation for Pier No. 5, but it was not sufficient to complete the work, and the work has not actually been begun, and the appropriation of $85,000 is now absolutely necessary in order to enable the authorities at the yard to begin the work and to give the yard the benefit of that additional pier, which is badly needed.

Mr. GREGG. Were any of those items cut below the estimates?

Mr. MOORE. The amount appropriated last year was $160,000, and the amount submitted by the department this year is $140,000. In speaking of a cut I mean it was a cut from last year's appropriation.

Mr. GREGG. I thought maybe the department had cut out something.

Mr. MOORE. The department cut out a number of things, notably the extension of streets and avenues, which are highly important in a yard of that kind, where we have a great deal of vacant territory that ought to be made available for the purposes of the yard, and the department also cut out one or two of the recommendations made by the officials at the yard. They wanted to extend their electrical and steam power system so that it might be utilized on the vessels at the docks, and so that they might be prepared for permanent improvements over the yard on ground that is not now generally improved. The authorities very properly looked forward to the improvement of the yard on a permanent basis, and having much waste land they are hoping for the opening up of the streets and for the extension of their various sources of power. This is very important in a yard of this kind, because the expense of hauling is very great, and there are times, especially in a season like this, when the streets are heavy and the wagons and drays that carry the material in the yard are stuck in the mud.

In some respects the yard is not up to date in the matter of common ordinary transportation facilities. If it were possible to increase that appropriation in any one respect, we would like to have it done. The extension of the streets, pavements, water, and electric-railroad systems are estimated by the authorities of the yard at $15,000.

Mr. TALBOTT. Was not that all taken up with Admiral Hollyday?

Mr. LEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE. That was cut out by the department. Whether you propose to go beyond the department's recommendation or not I do not know. All we can do is to urge you to do the best you can with respect to the streets extensions and the construction of a crane for one of the buildings there—building No. 10. This is important at this time for the carriage of freight and materials.

Our main plea is that nothing less than has been submitted by the department be allowed for that yard, particularly inasmuch as we observe that in some of the other yards there have been increased appropriations, notably at the city of Washington. In all fairness it must be stated that the department itself, following the lines of economy which this Congress seems to have sought to work out, and following the general tendency of the departmental administration in Washington, has cut down estimates for appropriations at other yards, so that we may not comparatively be suffering very much. But when we look at the appropriations running up to hundreds of thousands for other yards, we sometimes wonder why, in a general estimate from the department for a great yard like that at Philadelphia, we are left with a total estimated appropriation from the department of only $140,000.

Now, so much for the general conditions at the yard. A question has arisen which is regarded as highly important by certain citizens of Philadelphia, and one that properly should be presented to this committee in a general way by the delegation. In this matter there is, perhaps, a friendly rivalry, particularly so far as the newspapers of Philadelphia are concerned, and it may be that members of the delegation have entered into a friendly rivalry upon this question, but as to the ultimate object there is no difference of opinion whatever. Some of us who have been in Congress for some time feel that a question of this magnitude ought to be approached with very great caution and that this committee ought to be thoroughly fortified with opinions and estimates from the department before it proceeds to go into a matter of so much consequence. The question is the construction of a new dry dock. We have a dry dock at Philadelphia about 750 feet long. It is not the biggest dry dock in the United States, but it is an excellent dry dock. It was capable of housing the Dreadnought Utah and did it very well, but there is some difference of opinion as to the possible capacity in the matter of the entrance at the caisson for the admission of such vessels as may be constructed in the near future.

Mr. GREGG. When Admiral Hollyday was before the committee Mr. LEE went very fully into that matter. Have you read the hearing?

Mr. MOORE. No, sir; but I have talked with Admiral Hollyday on the subject and I have been at the yard a number of times, and have talked with officers there. The question seems to be as to the capacity at the entrance. The officers at the yard, supported very largely by public sentiment in the vicinity of the yard and in the city of Philadelphia, and by some newspaper comment, which is more or less limited, have insisted that there should be constructed there a dry dock that would extend from the Delaware River into the back channel which leads in from the Schuylkill River and completes the island, a distance of 1,700 feet. Now, ordinarily this committee would be startled, perhaps, and Congress itself would be somewhat surprised at having a suggestion made that at any yard there should be constructed a dry dock 1,700 feet long. Nobody ever heard of a dry dock 1,700 feet long. There is certainly nothing of the kind anywhere in the known world, but in this particular instance the proponents of the 1,700-foot dry dock contend that by reason of the configuration of the ground and the peculiar adaptability of the situation to the construction of a dry dock that should be continuous and reach from stream to stream, that it ought to be started in the city of Philadelphia. We agree with that and we would be very glad to have this committee take up that question and have some start made upon the proposition.

Some day you will have to have one great dry dock on the Atlantic coast and another one on the Pacific coast to provide for the very largest battleships that may be constructed, although I am one of those who want to limit the size of battleships, as I want to limit the depth of the artificial channels which cost this Government so much money and accommodate only certain great battleships and commercial vessels. But if you have to consider some day the centralization of the dry-dock facilities, naturally there is no point along the Atlantic coast where such a dry dock would be offered more advantages than at the port of Philadelphia and at the League Island Navy Yard, where you have fresh water, a desideratum not found anywhere else in the United States nor in the world, so far as navy yards are concerned.

Now, then, while the proposition may be startling at first blush, the truth is there is an island which presents a peculiar opportunity for the construction of a continuous dry dock that will lead from the Delaware River into the back channel which leads from the Schuylkill River. The distance happens to be 1,700 feet, and that accounts for the peculiar figures that are presented.

Leaving aside all the agitation and the perturbation of mind of a few of our newspaper friends who insist that something should be done, and done immediately, let us see just what the committee can do and let us present our claims as a delegation, so far as I am able to speak for the delegation.

The officials—that is, the local officials, at least—would like to have that dry dock. They believe a start should be made on the work. We will agree that all the citizens of Philadelphia would like to have it done. We contend that it would be a great advantage to the United States in general, and particularly to the Navy Department, in having such facilities in case of emergency. How are we going to present it? As a result of this agitation, Mr. DONOHOE became quite interested and active, and Mr. LEE, a member of this committee, also did us the honor to come to our city and inspect the navy yard—he has been there several times, and he has done it interestingly, as a good Congressman ought to do—and they have concluded that some big work should be started. We have not been oblivious, those of us who have been longer in the service, to the desire of many people to have this dry dock started, but we were always confronted with the peculiar proposition of the 1,700 feet and the enormous cost and the difficulties that we would face when we came before the Naval Affairs Committee of Congress.

In consequence of this agitation and after much thought upon the subject I presented a bill in the House on December 21, 1911, authorizing an appropriation for a dry dock at the Philadelphia Navy Yard. It provided for the construction at that navy yard of a dry dock "sufficient to float the largest battleship of the Navy," and appropriated $1,500,000. I was informed that a 1,700-foot dock would cost over $4,000,000, and it seemed to me that it would be almost a killing proposition to come before this committee and ask for $4,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the length of your proposed dry dock?

Mr. MOORE. I proposed to have a start and fixed the start at $1,500,000, which would be sufficient to build a dry dock at least 800 feet long—as long as any existing dry dock in the United States—and this bill, which is one paragraph provided——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). The dry docks we have been building at about that length have been costing something over $2,000,000, if I remember.

Mr. MOORE. That makes the situation so much more difficult. I have had some experience with the building of dry docks. As receiver, I completed the dry dock at Boston and know what it cost. It cost about $600,000 more than the contractor's price.

Mr. BUTLER. Did my colleague have in his mind the construction of a dry dock reaching from the Back Basin to the Delaware River, which, I think, is about 1,800 feet?

Mr. MOORE. One thousand seven hundred feet. This bill of mine contemplated meeting the situation in this way: If we could secure an appropriation of $1,500,000 it was provided—

"That plans for said dry dock shall contemplate its extension from the Delaware River through to the Back Basin, approximately a distance of 1,700 feet, to the end"—

This is the old river and harbor language where you begin something and do not complete it right away—

"to the end that said dry dock when completed shall be capable of admitting or discharging vessels at either end thereof."

That bill itself simply begins this enterprise. You can help us by a start of $1,500,000, which will give us a dry dock, according to the estimates I have, 800 feet long, which will be on the line of the proposed 1,700-foot project and will end somewhere about halfway through, and this leaves us open to come back to this committee with a view to the extension all the way through.

Mr. BUTLER. To put the other end on?

Mr. MOORE. Yes, sir. That was the proposition I presented to the committee, and it struck me as the one most feasible in view of our financial condition and in view of this committee's attitude toward projects of this kind.

Mr. LOUD. Except for the pumping machinery, that would be equivalent to two docks?

Mr. MOORE. That would be one continuous, but it would be constructed half at a time. If Congress later on wanted to run it through, it could continue it, and this would accommodate vessels coming and going. Following the introduction of that bill——

Mr. BUTLER (interposing). Did you have in your mind that it would afford a sort of waterway, too, between the channel and the ocean?

Mr. MOORE. I am an enthusiastic waterway man, and if I did not have that in mind——

Mr. BUTLER (interposing). I have seen some comment that this would afford a means of approach to the ocean which would save or spare vessels the travel of the distance around the end of the island.

Mr. MOORE. I can explain that.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish you would.

Mr. MOORE. I can explain what that means. The gentlemen who advanced that idea evidently hold the notion that it would save time and save the run around what we call the Horseshoe Bend in the river, which makes a curve way out toward the east. Coming up the Schuylkill through this back channel would avoid the Horseshoe Curve, which would save a mile or two.

Mr. DONOHOE. There is something else. You can work about the ships at the same time by the erection of the dry dock in the suggested bill introduced by Mr. LEE?

Mr. MOORE. I was coming to Mr. LEE's bill, and that very point. On January 12 Mr. LEE, of this committee, introduced a bill (H. R. 17760) authorizing an appropriation for a dry dock at the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

"A dry dock extending from the Delaware River to the Back Basin, approximately a length of 1,700 feet"—

He proposes to go right through—

"of depth and width corresponding with the locks of the Panama Canal."

That is to say, we should have at least 40 feet depth in this proposed new dry dock. Of course, that would mean—I do not want to discuss the bill while I am reading it—

"Of depth and width corresponding with the locks of the Panama Canal and capable of accommodating two of the largest battleships of the Navy, there be appropriated the sum of $3,000,000: Provided, That said dry dock be so constructed with a middle gate or caisson that one or two vessels may be handled, as the occasion may require."

That is Mr. LEE's bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Just at that point may I suggest that in the case of the dry dock at Pearl Harbor, which, I think, is about 850 feet long, the limit of cost is $2,700,000, and in the case of the dry dock at Puget Sound the limit of cost is $2,300,000.

Mr. MOORE. That is over 800 feet?

The CHAIRMAN. A little over 800 feet.

Mr. MOORE. That is the largest dry dock in the United States to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, with a 1,700-foot dry dock, what figures or information have you that such a dry dock would not reasonably cost something like $5,000,000 instead of $4,000,000, the figures given?

Mr. MOORE. Admiral Hollyday told me that a 1,700-foot dry dock, such as is proposed, would cost in excess of $4,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. But he did not say how much the excess would be?

Mr. MOORE. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is rather a large quantity.

Mr. MOORE. The question before you now is one as to whether there will be any recognition for this dry dock at all, which we all recommend, and second, whether you should start, as Mr. LEE proposes in his bill, to do the whole thing on the Panama Canal basis, or whether you should start in a more modest way, as I have proposed here, to establish a beginning which probably would prove the worth of the enterprise and then of continuing it if its worth is demonstrated. There is one objection to Mr. LEE's measure that I can see, and that is the objection I had to the proposal to dig the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal a depth of 35 feet.

There are about 13 miles of that canal, and this situation would correspond to the one at League Island; and at the other end of the canal, the lower end, there is probably not more than 20 or 25 feet of depth, and in the upper end it was shown that they did not have 30 feet, so that cutting the canal to 35 feet seemed an absurdity. But the estimated cost had to be presented to Congress. I have always had the notion that somebody did this deliberately. The report was presented to Congress recommending connecting the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays, but if it should be dug for 13 miles between the Delaware and the Chesapeake 35 feet deep we would have a hole in the ground which would mean that if you ever built a vessel in there drawing 35 feet it could not get out and would simply have to pass between Chesapeake Bay and Delaware Bay and stay there. The difficulty with the bill of Mr. LEE, which contemplates opening up the entire enterprise at once, is that if you make the depth and width of this 1,700 feet to correspond with the depth and width of the Panama Canal you will dig a hole in the ground between the Delaware River and the Schuylkill River out of which you can not get at all. It would seem to be——

Mr. DONOHOE (interposing). Any vessel that got in should certainly be able to get out?

Mr. MOORE. That is true; but I do not understand the necessity of digging 10 feet below the river depths.

Mr. DONOHOE. The further deepening of the Delaware River is certainly in contemplation?

Mr. MOORE. Yes, sir; we are trying to get 35 feet.

Mr. DONOHOE. We do not know what depth we may have to go in the future; it will be limited only by the size of the ships?

Mr. MOORE. That is true.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Lee's bill proposes to construct the dry dock corresponding with the depth of locks of the Panama Canal, which will limit the width and depth of ships in the future; and so if we build it properly now we will not have to rebuild it in the future?

Mr. MOORE. That argument would go if you could get up the Delaware River and out the Back Basin.

Mr. DONOHOE. It would do not harm?

Mr. MOORE. No, sir; it would do no harm; but there are 60 miles of channel that do not now exceed 30 feet, and therefore you would simply be digging a 40-foot hole 1,700 feet long to connect two bodies of water not more than 30 feet deep.

Mr. DONOHOE. That would have to be taken up in the future if we did not get it deep enough now.

Mr. MOORE. So far as the future is concerned, judging from my experience in this House in the past, I would say that we probably will not get 40 feet in the Delaware River for some time.

Mr. DONOHOE. But we hope for it?

Mr. MOORE. We certainly do. We are now striving to get 35 feet, and it will take at least six years.

Mr. DONOHOE. That is an item that can be amended?

Mr. MOORE. Certainly. If this committee will vote to adopt Mr. LEE's bill, I shall be delighted to see it done, because it will start us at once on the business; but I would suggest to the committee that that section be amended, because it would simply be unnecessary to dig below the approaches.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having commented upon these two measures and pointed out——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). I would like to ask you a question. What is your idea of the naval necessity for a dry dock of that size at that place?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, it would depend entirely upon the recognition given that navy yard by the Navy Department. If the department proposes to continue it even as a reserve basin, which we are informed it does, then it would be well to be prepared with another dock in addition to the one we have, larger than the one we have, to take care of vessels that come there, because it is the best repair station we have anywhere along the coast; it is the best material field, and it is the best labor field, and it is the best protected yard, because it is 100 miles away from the ocean and it is in fresh water.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think in time of stress many vessels would go up there if the enemy were down at the mouth?

Mr. MOORE. That is a splendid question, Mr. Chairman. I would say that it would be the best place in the United States if our intracoastal waterways were cut through to New York. They could come up the Delaware and get out of the way. That we hope some day will eventuate; but even as it is, the Chesapeake Bay being in danger and in a measure not so thoroughly well protected——

Mr. TALBOTT (interposing). The Chesapeake Bay?

Mr. MOORE. In some respects it is not so thoroughly well protected. I am as fond of it as any man, because it is one of the finest bodies of water in the country. It is not so well protected as it should be, and there is now a commission undertaking to devise ways and means to better shield it against the possibility of a foreign attack; but I take it that if there is going to be a serious invasion it will not be altogether where there is waste land, but where they can reach some of the skyscrapers and get some of the spoils of warfare, and I think they would strike a point like New York or Philadelphia very quickly, if they could. They could get into New York and into Boston, but they certainly would have difficulty in getting into Philadelphia as we are situated now.

Mr. BUTLER. On account of a point of order, how are you going to keep the dry dock in the bill?

Mr. GREGG. They are offering a separate bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that.

Mr. MOORE. I will answer that question.

Mr. BUTLER. Do you request that this item be incorporated in the appropriation bill?

Mr. MOORE. Yes, sir; we hope so. As a matter of fairness to the people we ask that this project be incorporated in this bill, but I am coming to the point now raised by Mr. BUTLER. First you have Mr. LEE's general bill, which proposes to begin at once and make the entire appropriation, or, at least, make so large an appropriation that it would probably mean the immediate completion of the work. Then you have my bill, which proposes to make a start on a more moderate basis. Now, then, if you will take Mr. LEE's bill, with the amendments that have been suggested, I hope you will do it. If you find that you can not take Mr. LEE's bill, and will take my bill and incorporate it in your appropriation bill, I hope you will do that, but if you find that you can not do that—that both requests are unreasonable at this time or are beyond your means at this time—then give us a start of some kind; do what you can as to that.

We have not plans and specifications sufficient to properly inform this committee in regard to this project. Now, if you can't do anything else, will you do this: Will you provide in this bill an appropriation of $100,000 to prepare plans and specifications, so that we may have something tangible to talk about when the next year's appropriation bill comes up? If you will not take Mr. LEE's bill, and I hope you will, and if you will not take my bill, and I hope you will, then give us $100,000 to give us a start on the plans and specifications.

The CHAIRMAN. May I bring your attention to this fact: That the Government has an engineer corps under the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and that if they see fit they can submit plans and specifications without that appropriation?

Mr. MOORE. I presume they could do that.

Mr. BUTLER. We never have made a separate appropriation.

Mr. LEE. That is the business of the Government?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; if they see fit to recommend.

Mr. ROBERTS. I would like to call Mr. MOORE's attention to the fact that he has not told us yet how he is going to word the point of order.

Mr. MOORE. That this is new legislation?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE. Well, I admit that there is some difficulty about it. If you feel that you can not put this item in the appropriation bill and that it would be ruled out on a point of order, then I ask that you pass a separate bill, let it come as a new matter, and I think that would be the safer thing to do. I have feared that we were asking too much at the start—I want to be very frank with the committee about it—I have feared that the committee would not take this so seriously as some of the newspaper headlines in Philadelphia have made it; but we have felt there was nothing for us to do but to come here and ask the committee to help us out in this matter, satisfied in the last analysis if you can not give us Mr. LEE's bill as a separate proposition, or that you can not give us my bill as a separate proposition, you will at least give us a more moderate start.

Mr. LEE. You stated that it would cost between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000 to build a dry dock similar to the one covered in the bill I have introduced?

Mr. MOORE. In excess of $4,000,000.

Mr. LEE. Does the gentleman not know that the properties at League Island would make this dry dock cost practically half what it would anywhere else in this country?

Mr. MOORE. It undoubtedly would cost less, because we would not have to acquire outside property.

Mr. LEE. Do you not know that the sand and gravel at League Island would practically cut down the cost of this dry dock one-half what it would cost any other place in America?

Mr. MOORE. Well, Mr. Lee, I do know that that would be a feature in the way of economy. It would be a saving to the Government.

Mr. LEE. I just wanted to call your attention to it.

Mr. MOORE. That should be considered; but there is no question but that it would cost in excess of $4,000,000, independent of all that.

Mr. LEE. Is it not a fact that we do paving at League Island for half what it costs at any other navy yard?

Mr. MOORE. I can not tell.

Mr. LEE. On account of the properties at the navy yard. We have sand and gravel there to make all the concrete that would be used in building a dry dock of the kind my bill covers.

Mr. MOORE. We have certain decided advantages in the matter of raw material.

Mr. LEE. The dry dock can be built for $3,000,000, and I claim that it will make it the cheapest dry dock which the Government owns. I went over this thing very carefully when I was there, and I am mechanic enough to know that we can mix all the concrete and get all the properties right there on the island so as to make that dry dock cost practically $3,000,000 or less.

Mr. MOORE. I am very glad to hear you say so.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BUTLER. What size vessels can go up there?

Mr. MCCREARY. The mean depth is about 29 feet.

Mr. MOORE. Any war vessel the Government has can go up there.

Mr. BUTLER. I mean, can it go up there?

Mr. MOORE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I understood that you have at mean low water 30 feet?

Mr. MOORE. We have a rise in the tide there of 7 feet. Our mean low water now exceeds 28 feet. It is legislatively 30 feet and is substantially 30 feet all the way up the 60 miles.

Mr. GREGG. What is the length of the dry dock you have there?

Mr. MOORE. About 750 feet—to be exact, 744.6½ over all. The Utah, built across the river by the New York Shipbuilding Co., is one on the very largest vessels the Government has thus far built. She is one of the new Dreadnoughts, and she has been in the dock.

Mr. LOUD. What is the width of the gate?

Mr. MOORE. At the top of the caisson it is slightly over 102 feet. It tapers off to 80 feet, or thereabouts.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. How large is the dock at Norfolk, since it was enlarged last year?

Mr. MOORE. That would be a little larger than ours.

Mr. BUTLER. That is not yet completed?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; it is completed.

Mr. REYBURN. I think, gentlemen, we can present a reasonable case in Philadelphia—that we can show reasonable cause why Philadelphia should be selected as the point, the most strategic and advantageous point, for placing this dry dock and having our large naval base.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to ask you a question or two. Can you recall how many acres there are in the navy yard?

Mr. REYBURN. I can not.

Mr. LEE. About 800.

Mr. MOORE. Over 900 acres; approximately 1,000.

Mr. BUTLER. They have parade grounds, rifle range, and the Government would not have to purchase any land?

Mr. MOORE. No, sir; they have plenty of land there.

Mr. LEE. Just at this particular point I would like to call Mr. Moore's attention to a few questions I asked Admiral Hollyday when he was before this committee, with regard to the cost at the League Island Navy Yard:

"Mr. LEE. You spoke yesterday of the low cost of paving in the Philadelphia Navy Yard. Is that due to the fact that the sand and everything is right there on the ground?

"Admiral HOLLYDAY. Yes.

"Mr. LEE. Would not that same thing apply to the large dry dock if it was built in the Philadelphia Navy Yard?

"Admiral HOLLYDAY. For making the concrete it would. The concrete would be made at less cost."

Mr. MOORE. Do not misunderstand me. I agree with that thoroughly.

Mr. LEE. I want to show that the gentleman was away off when he said that the dry dock would cost four or five million dollars at Philadelphia, when I know from experts who have made a study of the ground properties that a dry dock of the size I propose could be built for $3,000,000 or less.

Mr. MOORE. I hope that is true.

Mr. LEE. On account of the properties.

Mr. MOORE. For that reason I am advocating your bill, with the limitations I suggested.

Mr. LEE. When the committee gets to Philadelphia, if they will accept the invitation which I extended before Mr. DONOHOE gave his invitation this morning, I propose to show them——

Mr. MOORE (interposing). I join in that invitation.

Mr. LEE (continuing). That the properties at League Island are just as I have stated them to be.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Lee, were you here when Admiral Hollyday stated that a dry dock 1,700 feet long would cost $4,000,000?

Mr. LEE. Yes, sir. And then I showed that the cost of paving at League Island was $1.52 and at any other navy yard it was $3 per yard, and it was stated that the sand and mixture for concrete at League Island were the cause of the low cost of paving at that yard.

Mr. MOORE. Do you think that will make a million dollars difference?

Mr. LEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE. I want to thank you very much for the hearing this morning, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, and assure you that we appreciate your courtesy.

Mr. DONOHOE. I desire to associate myself with that expression of thanks on behalf of the members of the delegation.

Mr. ROBERTS. I want to call Mr. Moore's attention to the fact that the Navy Department gives the controlling depth of water from League Island to the sea at mean low water as 28 feet.

The CHAIRMAN. But they have a 7-foot tide there.

Mr. MOORE. Answering the question, I desire to say that so far as the War Department is concerned the channel is legislatively completed at 30 feet for mean low water.

Mr. HENSLEY. What do you mean by "legislatively"?

Mr. MOORE. They have reported that we have 30 feet of water, so far as all legislation and engineering is concerned, for a length of 60 miles.

There are creeks and rivers running into the main channel which add to the silt formation. It is a slushy, soft sort of material, and men who navigate the ships differ as to the actual bottom depth; but it is a fact that we have more than 28 feet at mean low water, and we have what the Army engineers and shipping men consider an actual 30-foot mean low-water depth, including this silt. At this time we are working under the new appropriation on a 35-foot channel, and that work demonstrates that here and there may be a formation of silt which raises the bottom at certain points in this 60-mile length. Vessels drawing more than 28 feet can and do push their way through it, but they also take advantage of the tides. The problem is one of dredging and maintenance, and we are now trying to meet it. I think, perhaps, some member of the committee may have in mind the going ashore some years ago of the U. S. S. Prairie, which had started on a mission to South America and ran aground; but she was probably 1,800 feet out of her course. We have never charged that up to the Delaware Channel, but we have, rather, charged it up to navigation.

Thereupon the committee adjourned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Canal leading from Centennial Lake at Vicksburg, Miss., to the Mississippi River, with a view to the preservation of the channel.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by adding the following, after line 9, page 50:

"Memphis Harbor: With a view to the preservation of the channel between President Island and the Tennessee shore and the preservation of the banks on the Tennessee side in Memphis Harbor; also for the preservation and protection of the channel and banks of the Wolf River in said harbor."

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COLLIER. I wish to offer an amendment to come right after line 9 on page 50, which is germane to the proposition in the bill. I would like to ask whether or not the amendment which I wish to offer should come first?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Mississippi may offer his amendment first, and that mine may come in just after.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] is recognized.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 50, line 9, by adding after the word "channel" the words "and banks."

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, prior to 1903 for many years all of the commerce coming down the Yazoo River and its tributaries to Vicksburg was carried through the mouth of the Yazoo River out into the Mississippi and then up Lake Centennial to the city of Vicksburg, but there was no continuous navigation because of a shifting bar at the mouth of the Yazoo River and also because there was low water at certain stages in front of the city of Vicksburg. It was finally determined, and in the river and harbor act of 1892 the project was adopted, to divert the Yazoo River a few miles above its mouth—about 6½ miles south—into the Mississippi River for the purpose of securing continuous navigation. This project was completed in 1905 at a cost of $1,179,210.37. Uninterrupted navigation has been maintained at that point for nine years for boats of 6-feet draft at low water. The amount of commerce carried through the mouth of that canal amply justifies the expense of the project. The report of the Chief of Engineers shows that for the last seven years the amount of commerce has averaged between 220,000 and 440,000 tons, with estimated values of between $6,000,000 and $13,000,000. During the last seven years the average has been 230,000 tons and the value something over $8,000,000. The reductions in freight rates have been as follows: On cotton about 50 per cent; on cotton seed about 33⅓ per cent; on live stock about 66⅔ per cent; on flour, meal, provisions, and grain from 33⅓ to 40 per cent.

On the banks at Vicksburg Harbor there has been a great deal of caving and sliding. A number of warehouses, the compress, and other buildings are situated upon this bank and some of them are now in a very exposed condition. In some cases the caving extends within a few feet of the buildings.

This recent caving has been caused by the deepening of the canal, owing to the fact that the entire Yazoo River is now going between these narrow banks, and also probably in a large degree by the fact that last year during the great overflow of the Mississippi Delta an immense volume of water from the crevasses in the levees passed through that canal.

The Rivers and Harbors Committee, realizing the importance of this matter and the seriousness of this situation, have incorporated in their bill a survey with a view to the preservation of the channel. I ask that this survey be extended to the preservation of the banks. That is all I ask, that it be extended right along on the banks of the canal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COLLIER. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request for two minutes more?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLIER. It can well be contended, in the interest of navigation, that the widening of the channel between the two banks in a narrow canal might, at certain seasons of the year and certain stages of the water, seriously interfere with permanent navigation.

Again, as I understand it, the purpose of this committee in considering projects is to secure navigation in order that commerce may be preserved. Harbors themselves are essential instrumentalities for commerce, and it may often occur that the preservation of a harbor means that commerce itself has been preserved.

Mr. Chairman, in this bill the committee have proposed a survey. It will not add much to the expense if the engineers extend this survey to the banks.

All I ask the House to give me is the authority of the engineers to investigate the situation and let them report or devise some means or some plan whereby a disastrous situation may be avoided.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. How far does the gentleman think the Government ought to go for the preservation of the banks of a stream beyond what is necessary to preserve the channel for commerce?

Mr. COLLIER. That is far enough.

Mr. MANN. That is already covered. The item now provides "with a view to preserving the channel." Now, when you have done that, how much further does the gentleman think the Government ought to go in preserving the banks?

Mr. COLLIER. Does the gentleman from Illinois contend that the widening of a channel or the widening of the narrow banks of a canal might not essentially interfere with the navigation at low stages of water where permanent navigation is to be maintained?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. This item already covers the preservation of the channel, which I assume, of course, is for commerce. Now, when that is done, does not that take care of the banks sufficiently, or does the gentleman desire the Government to wall up the banks for the benefit of private owners?

Mr. COLLIER. As I stated in the first part of my remarks, I believe that the harbor itself is one of the essential instrumentalities of commerce, and the destruction of a harbor might mean the destruction of commerce.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it the duty of the Government, where it constructs a harbor, to wall up on the outside and construct in that way docks for the use of private property?

Mr. COLLIER. No, sir; the gentleman does not think so.

Mr. MANN. Beyond the preservation of the channel, how much does the gentleman want the Government to do in the preservation of the banks? I do not see the point of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. COLLIER. I want the Government engineers to look at the situation where the canal is widened, where the banks are caving in, a canal that brings through every year over $8,000,000 of commerce—I want them to look at it and the banks and devise some plan to relieve the situation. It may be that they can not devise any; it may be that under the rules of the engineer's office they can present no reports. I am asking for a chance for them to go there and do it.

Mr. MANN. And I am trying to help the gentleman out. As a matter of fact, under this provision will they not be required to look at the banks and everything that is connected with or affects the channel?

Mr. COLLIER. It may be that they would.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi will not add anything to the authorization already in the bill. The item reads:

Canal leading from Centennial Lake at Vicksburg, Miss., to the Mississippi River, with a view to the preservation of the channel.

Now, there is often great contention before the committee about the extent of damage that is done by caving in of banks, but all that we can do is to give them a survey which covers navigation, and this does it. This amendment itself does not add anything to it. Besides that, this comes up in other cases. On page 51 there is an item, "Saugatuck Harbor, Mich., with a view of determining what additional works are necessary or desirable to maintain the channel of existing project." On the same theory that could be amended, and so on all through the bill. We have used the proper language that ought to be used in all these projects, and we are opposed to any amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COLLIER) there were—ayes 23, noes 37.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the following after line 9 on page 50: "Memphis Harbor, with a view to the preservation of the channel between President Island and the Tennessee shore, and the preservation of the banks on the Tennessee side in Memphis Harbor.

"Also for the preservation and perfection of the channel and banks of the Wolf River within said harbor."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, on Saturday I offered an amendment to the bill seeking to have the Government aid in protecting the city of Memphis from flood waters which do not belong to her, but are the results of the building of levees on the river generally. In opposing this amendment my distinguished and delightful friend from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] and a member of the committee, claimed I was simply for a private gas and water plant in Memphis and further says:

It is a spirit of unfairness, and it is an ungenerous spirit of the people of the city of Memphis, that sits on a high hill surrounded by these deltas from which it draws its trade and its prosperity, and for the upkeep of the levees which protect them she pays not one nickel in taxes. * * * In order to help the city of Memphis, where the assessed taxed value of property exceeds the assessed value of the property in all those deltas combined in order to help that city to protect her gas plant or water works.

Mr. Chairman, this is a very ungenerous and unfair statement. I am going to read from the report of the Mississippi River Commission, which shows how greatly mistaken our friend and neighbor from Mississippi is. There were 170 acres of our city overflowed in the last high waters, according to this report. In this overflowed district are situated dwellings, stores, churches, schools, railroads, street-car lines, jail, gas plant, manufacturing establishments, and a part of the city water supply plant. I further quote from the report:

The character of the pecuniary damages in this area is that due to the submergence of stores, dwellings, churches, schools, jail, etc., which was so extensive that the water reached well up into the first story of these buildings; that of the street-car lines resulting in a loss of revenue; of railroads necessitating the detour over other tracks; of the city gas plant and the discontinuance of the city gas supply; of the city pumping station; of many industrial manufacturing establishments' plants; and a part of the municipal water supply, including its contamination by surface-water sewage.

The estimate of the damages was fixed by the commission at over $1,200,000.

Mr. Chairman, I think that shows that my friend from Mississippi was entirely in error about the facts which urged me to propose that amendment. Talk about being unfair and ungenerous. I think he is unfair and ungenerous on another proposition. While I ask for aid in protecting the city of Memphis from these flood waters, over which it has no control, and for which it has no responsibility, the little city of Greenville, from which my distinguished friend comes, just below us on this river, is year by year receiving large sums from the Government for just such protection as the city of Memphis now asks. But my friend says that we pay no taxes. I want to say to him that the city of Memphis pays more direct taxes to the Government than his entire State does. From the post office in the city of Memphis alone the Federal Government receives annually a net amount of over $400,000, and from the internal revenue another large amount, making the city contribute more than half a million dollars of net income to the Government.

For the past 15 years the city of Memphis has not received any benefits for its harbor except, as I want to say to my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], who has just been discussing railroads and their relation to harbor improvements, such as were given by the Mississippi River Commission apparently for the purpose of aiding a railroad crossing there at that city. In this connection I quote as follows from the report of the Mississippi River Commission, 1908, volume 3, pages 2644 and 2645:

During the high water of 1907 the bank behind the Rock Island Railway incline began to cave very rapidly, and by the end of the high water a pocket about 875 by 200 feet had been eroded. This erosion did not extend below low water over a great portion of the pocket, and thus made the repair work very difficult, because the water was too shallow to permit satisfactory pocket mat work, and the wide flank bank exposed when the water was 6 feet on the Memphis gauge had to be paved with stone. This pocket was completely protected, and the high waters of the present season do not seem to have affected it materially.

There are a good many places along this revetment that need repair. These are practically all of them just above the low-water line, and can only be reached when the river is at a very low stage. It is proposed to repair these during the coming season if the stage of water permits.

And also:

The Rock Island Railway Co. has abandoned its incline in Wolf River and is now operating one on the main bank of the Mississippi, thus removing one of the chief reasons for dredging. No work is contemplated at this point during the coming year.

The work on either side of the river where the Rock Island Railroad Co. transfers its cars over the river seems to be the only work which has been done by the commission in the Memphis Harbor in many years. If there was any object other than aiding the railroad company in preserving its west terminus, it does not appear in this report.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask that this amendment for a survey be adopted by the committee.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he is already given ample authority in the bill. If he will turn back to page 36 he will find the following provision:

Improving Mississippi River from Head of Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, including salaries, clerical, office, traveling, and miscellaneous expenses of the Mississippi River Commission: Continuing improvement with a view to securing a permanent channel depth of 9 feet, $6,000,000, which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission, as approved by the Chief of Engineers, for the general improvement of the river, for the building of levees between the Head of Passes and Cape Girardeau, Mo., and for surveys, including the survey from the Head of Passes to the headwaters of the river, in such manner as in their opinion shall best improve navigation and promote the interests of commerce at all stages of the river.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman, Is it not a fact that that same provision has been in all these river and harbor bills for many years, and is it not a fact that no survey has been made of the Memphis Harbor during that time?

Mr. BURGESS. I do not know about that, but it is a fact that we make none in this bill. The gentleman is the first man who has offered an amendment here directly for a survey of the Mississippi River.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas yield for a question?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it not also a fact that since this provision appeared in the river and harbor bills for many years there never has been a special provision for the survey of any harbor on the Mississippi between these points?

Mr. BURGESS. That is a fact. That is what I am telling the gentleman.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, on line 7, page 50, is there not a provision for the canal leading from Centennial Lake at Vicksburg, Miss., to the Mississippi River, and is not that a part of the harbor?

Mr. BURGESS. Oh, no; that is a canal cut by the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. This on the Wolf River, or a part of it?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that that part of the Wolf River is under the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission, and all funds that have been devoted to its improvement are taken from the funds carried for the Mississippi River Commission, but that is not the case with Centennial Lake Canal.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is connected with it just as the Wolf River is connected with the Mississippi.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. But this canal is not within the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission, for the good and sufficient reason that the law has never put it under its jurisdiction.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is there anything that put the Wolf River under the Mississippi River Commission?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes; it is one of the waters connected with it. I will state to the gentleman that when I was young in the service here I made a very desperate effort to have the $25,000 that was called for for the Wolf River appropriated as a separate item, so that it would not come out of the Mississippi River Commission fund, but I was unsuccessful, because they said, "We will make a lump-sum appropriation for the Mississippi River, and all of you will take your chances."

Mr. McKELLAR. That is a chance I have not been able to get from the commission, and I want to get it at the hands of the House if I can.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mouth of Brazos River up to Freeport, Tex., with a view to securing a depth of 25 feet.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 50, between lines 12 and 13, by inserting the following: "Channel at Seadrift, Tex., with a view of providing a suitable connection with the Texas coast waterway."

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I move the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Little Calumet River, Ill. and Ind., from the junction up to Blue Island.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 51, between lines 21 and 22, insert the following: "Missouri River at Kansas City, Kans.: The provision of the river and harbor act approved July 25, 1912, authorizing preliminary examination and survey of the Missouri River from the mouth of the Kansas River to a point at or near the western limit of Kansas City, Kans., is hereby amended and reenacted so as to read as follows: 'Missouri River from the mouth of the Kansas River to a point at or near where the west line of Kansas City, Kans., extended intersects the Missouri River.'"

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I notice in that amendment and in several places in the bill it provides that certain provisions are hereby amended and reenacted. We have invariably in the House stricken out the provision "and reenacted." It is contrary to the statutes, to begin with, and is not required, because when you amend a proposition to read as follows that is all that is necessary. That is the practice, and I hope the gentleman will be willing to strike out the words "and reenacted."

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have no objection to that, and will so move.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The question was taken, and the amendment as modified was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Stillaguamish River, Wash.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 52, between lines 13 and 14, insert the following: "Coeur d'Alene River, Idaho."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to recur to an earlier part of the bill in order to present an amendment, and I thought that this was the most opportune time in which to do it before we begin on section 3.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows there are several pages of the bill which have been passed over which will have to be recurred to.

Mr. HAMILL. I did not know that, and I withdraw the request for unanimous consent at this time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. McKELLAR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3175) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States, and had still further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the House, had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LODGE, Mr. DILLINGHAM, and Mr. PERCY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

(a) The existence and establishment of both private and public terminal and transfer facilities contiguous to the navigable water proposed to be improved, and, if water terminals have been constructed, the general location, description, and use made of the same, with an opinion as to their adequacy and efficiency, whether private or public. If no public terminals have been constructed, or if they are inadequate in number, there shall be included in the report an opinion in general terms as to the necessity, number, and appropriate location of the same, and also the necessary relations of such proposed terminals to the development of commerce.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. I would like to have the attention of the chairman for a moment. Does not the gentleman think, in view of this provision in the bill, that there ought to be a limitation placed upon the appropriations in this bill with reference to the expenditure in these harbors where the docks and piers are owned by private corporations and controlled, withholding it until some remedy is made admitting free use of them? If the public expends the money to improve a property, the public should have the free use of the property. Now, I have just one instance in my mind. In regard to one of the Pacific steamship companies the testimony showed about a year ago before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that they had to pay $125,000 a year to one of the dock owners in New York for permission to land their ships, load and unload their cargoes, and that that had been going on for quite a while. Now, is it right to use the public money to improve property over which private dominion is exercised in that manner, making it an obstacle to the commerce of this country, and in view of that ought there not to be a limitation added to this bill withholding the expenditure for any improvement until there is a surrender of this private monopoly to public use? I ask the chairman of the committee for his idea upon that proposition.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would say no. I do not think that an amendment like that or a provision like that should be inserted in this bill.

I will say to the gentleman and to the House that I have had that matter under consideration now for some little time, and, in order to get information upon which we could legislate intelligently, we inserted in the last river and harbor bill a provision which is like that which has just been read. The effort here is to reenact that provision for the purpose of making the provision general, it having applied by its terms only to the act of the last Congress. When we get all this information in, and not before, we will be in a position to legislate intelligently. Otherwise we might do a great injustice at some place if we went at it blindly. If we should insert a provision like that which the gentleman suggests, it would have to be a general provision applying to every harbor in the country, and in some of them injustice might be done. In fact, we might do injustice to all the harbors. But when we get this provision in and know just what we are doing, I for one propose to try to draft some provision, some law, which will reach the trouble that the gentleman is trying to reach or suggesting that we put something in here to reach.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman admits that the trouble exists?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, yes; I admit that.

Mr. CULLOP. And it is a serious trouble and one contrary to sound public policy.

Now, I desire to deny the proposition that the gentleman makes, that such a limitation would withhold the appropriation for every harbor included in the bill. It would, if all of these harbors were in this combine, for it is one of the greatest trusts in this country. If they were not, that fact could be very easily shown to the War Department, and the improvement of every harbor not under that restriction would go on without interference.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, while that situation exists, certainly the money of the Public Treasury ought not to be taken to improve private property, and consequently a showing should be made to the War Department by such a limitation as I have suggested being incorporated in the bill, that this or that particular harbor was not thus controlled, and the improvement would go on. That showing could be made, I say, and it would not withhold a single cent of the appropriation for the harbor that was free. But where the harbor and the landing facilities, the wharfage facilities, the dockage facilities, are absolutely controlled, as they are in a number of instances in the most important points of commerce in this country, some limitation ought to be made by which they would surrender this monopoly, which is unjust to the American people.

At this time it is a barrier against commerce and a detriment to the trade of this country. There are places now that the Government is appropriating money to improve where a vessel not controlled by one of these numerous corporations can not land or load or unload a single pound of freight.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Could the gentleman state just what harbor is in his mind now?

Mr. CULLOP. I have in mind the harbor at Baltimore, and in part the harbor at Philadelphia, and in a large measure the harbor at New York; a number of them.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, I have heard testimony before my committee to the effect that no vessel not controlled or operated by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. has any place in the city of Baltimore where it could load or unload, because the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. controlled the frontage and the dockage, and therefore had possession of the trade and the commerce coming from the high seas into that port. It was within the control of that one company to dominate the use of the docks and wharves there.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman contend that dockage along public waterways ought not to be owned by private individuals?

Mr. CULLOP. They ought not to be owned and controlled so as to shut out commerce. A rental may be proper, but as long as they are owned and controlled in the interests of some single shipping line that is an absolute detriment to the commerce of the country and a hardship upon the people.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose, for example, the gentleman owned 25 ships, and these ships were sailing into the various ports, does the gentleman contend it would not be altogether proper for him to own his own docks into which these ships could come, and that these ships owned by him should have exclusive right to come into the docks owned by him?

Mr. CULLOP. As a selfish proposition I might claim it, but as a public proposition I have no right to claim it, and I or any other person ought not to be permitted to do so.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman contend, then, that the municipalities within which the harbors exist should buy all the property used for dockage purposes?

Mr. CULLOP. Not necessarily that; but the municipality in which the docking exists ought to have municipal regulations by which there would be a free interchange of commerce, and that no one line or no one company should absolutely dominate the landing, the loading, and the unloading of the commerce that comes to that port.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman contend that if he owned a lot, and wished to build a house on that lot, that I would have the right to build a house on the lot and use it when I pleased?

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, that is a different proposition. No individual owns the streams or waterways in this country. Public policy would forbid it.

Mr. MADDEN. Nobody owns the streets.

Mr. CULLOP. No; and you could not build a house in the street. And no man has a right to build the dockages on the banks of either ocean or river to exclude the right or the free exercise of the uses of the port.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I want to say to the gentleman that if his contention were to be exercised as a fact there would be no commerce coming into any State of the Union.

Mr. CULLOP. I beg the gentleman's pardon. There would be more than double the tonnage the first year you turned them over to public use coming into the ports of this country. To-day you are turning it away from these ports by permitting this monopoly to exist, and the people are suffering on account of it.

The improvement of our rivers and harbors, I admit, is a matter of vast public importance. It affects the commerce of the entire population in the country and involves more or less the prosperity of the whole people, but around every appropriation should be strict limitations, in order that it may be expended for public benefit and not in aid of private enterprise. Unless such restrictions are employed for the protection of the public it will inure to the purpose of assisting private enterprise. The control of the dockage facilities in our larger coast points constitutes to-day an aggravated monopoly, which harasses commerce and unjustly burdens the producing and consuming public. Private enterprise owning and controlling these facilities have employed them to create and serve monopoly, and thereby restrict the commerce of our country instead of enlarging it. By it traffic on our waterways is restricted and high rates maintained, which affect injuriously every department of business and retard the development of our resources. Our natural highways should remain free and open to the public, and every attempt to monopolize them should be resented, it matters not under whatever guise it may be presented. Relieve these from the control which now dominate them and open them up to the public, that the commerce of the country may enjoy their unobstructed use and the people have the benefit therefrom and a prosperous condition will result.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That all reports on examinations and surveys authorized by law shall be reviewed by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors as provided for in section 3 of the river and harbor act approved June 13, 1902, and all special reports ordered by Congress shall, in the discretion of the Chief of Engineers, be reviewed in like manner by said board; and the said board shall also, on request by resolution of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate or the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, submitted to the Chief of Engineers, examine and review the report of any examination or survey made pursuant to any act or resolution of Congress, and report thereon through the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, who shall submit his conclusions thereon as in other cases: Provided, That in no case shall the board, in its report thus called for by committee resolution, extend the scope of the project contemplated in the original report upon which its examination and review has been requested, or in the provision of law authorizing the original examination or survey: Provided further, That said board shall consist of seven members, a majority of whom shall be of rank not less than lieutenant colonel.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order upon the last proviso.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that the word "be" is omitted before the word "submitted," on line 5, page 55.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What page?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Page 55, line 5. It reads:

And the said board shall also, on request by resolution of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate or the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, submitted—

It should read "be submitted," as the Clerk read. Is the word "be" to be in there?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think the word "be" should be in there, but it was accidentally omitted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I merely submit it to the committee. I do not know whether it ought to be in there or not.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order upon the last proviso, section 4. May I ask the gentleman, as I understand the law now, this board must consist of not less than five or more than nine, leaving it to the Chief Engineer to determine how many of the members shall be on the board, and as a matter of fact the board does not vary. This provision provides seven, the majority of whom shall not be of less rank than lieutenant colonel. How many lieutenant colonels are there in the Engineer Corps?

Mr. SPARKMAN. They have nine division engineers, and I think they are of the grade of lieutenant colonels or colonels.

Mr. MANN. How many of this board now are lieutenant colonels?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think there are only two lieutenant colonels—maybe three.

Mr. MANN. It looks to me, unless the committee is fully informed on the subject, that they are likely to be embarrassed.

Mr. BURGESS. The report of the majority of them was in the last bill.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. My understanding is there are six altogether on the commission, four of whom are lieutenant colonels.

Mr. MANN. Does it require the majority of them shall be lieutenant colonels?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is what I am basing my judgment on, because the last law provides that the majority of them shall be of not less rank than lieutenant colonel.

Mr. MANN. That is the law passed at last session?

Mr. BURGES. The law of 1912 reads:

And provided further, That the majority of said board shall be of rank not less than lieutenant colonel.

Mr. MANN. How does that work? It has not worked well so far.

Mr. SPARKMAN. In what respect has it worked badly?

Mr. MANN. If it has worked well, why do you want to change it?

Mr. BURGESS. We do not want to change it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes.

Mr. BURGESS. The language is just the same.

Mr. MANN. You change this feature of the law, which I assume is an evidence that it has not worked well.

Mr. SPARKMAN. No.

Mr. MANN. If it has worked well, then I shall insist on the point of order against changing it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The reason is not that it has not worked well, but that it might work ill in the future, because it might be possible to increase the board to nine on one particular project. For instance, where six were unable to agree, it might be possible to increase the number to nine, and thereby get a verdict.

Mr. MANN. On the other hand, it seems to me that there may be some project, not of great importance, which may properly be submitted to 5 members, and there might be some other project, like the intercoastal proposition or the Chicago-Gulf proposition, or something of that sort, where they would want the opinion not only of 9, but perhaps of 19.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman can understand, of course, how very severe criticism could be made upon the board of engineers where a project was reported unfavorably by nine, and the board was immediately reduced in number to five, six, or seven. I know the gentleman can draw upon his imagination and see certain gentlemen arising here and claiming that the board had been stacked against a particular project.

Mr. MANN. I think I have quite a vivid imagination at times, but that goes beyond my imagination; not beyond my imagining somebody criticizing it, because during this debate I have heard gentlemen severely criticize the Engineer Corps, although I am sure that it was rather in a facetious than a serious manner, for I think no one who is familiar with that corps really criticizes their judgment or their honesty.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I agree to that absolutely. Nobody familiar with the corps would criticize them.

Mr. MANN. I have some doubt about this paragraph, but I withdraw the point of order. I question the desirability of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That section 5 of the river and harbor act approved July 25, 1912, be, and the same is hereby, amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to have prepared and transmitted to Congress at the earliest practicable date a compilation of preliminary examinations, surveys, and appropriations for works of river and harbor improvement similar in general form and subject matter to that which was prepared in accordance with the act of June 13, 1902, and printed in House Document No. 421, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session: Provided, That the report to be prepared in accordance with this provision shall be a revised edition of the report printed in the document above mentioned, extended to the end of the Sixty-second Congress."

Mr. MANN. Is not the chairman of the committee willing to move to strike out the words "and reenacted," in line 20, page 55?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; I move that the words "and reenacted," in line 20, page 55, be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 55, line 20, amend by striking out the words "and reenacted."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the first paragraph of section 6 of the river and harbor act approved July 25, 1912, be, and the same is hereby, amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That there shall be printed 3,000 copies of a revised edition of the laws of the United States relating to the improvement of rivers and harbors passed between and including August 11, 1790, and the close of the third session of the Sixty-second Congress, of which 600 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,400 copies for the use of the House, and 1,000 copies for the use of the War Department. Said compilation shall be printed under the direction of the Secretary of War."

Mr. SPARKMAN. I move to strike out the words "and reenacted" in line 13, page 56.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 56, in line 13, strike out the words "and reenacted."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to designate any officer of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, whose assignment of duty relates to harbor work in, or in the neighborhood of, New York Harbor, to act as a member of the New Jersey and New York Joint Harbor Line Commission, constituted by authority of the Legislatures of the States of New Jersey and New York: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States by reason of such designation, except the usual and necessary travel expenses of the officer so designated between his station and the place of meeting of the commission: And provided further, That the officer so designated shall perform his duties as member of the commission without interference with his regular duties, and that he shall receive no additional compensation from any source on account of his service on such commission except such reimbursement of his expenses for other travel with the commission as may be provided by the States aforesaid.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that section.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. Does my colleague's amendment relate to this section or is it a separate paragraph?

Mr. FOWLER. It is a separate paragraph.

Mr. MANN. That is what I supposed. I reserve a point of order on the section read.

Mr. Chairman, legislation is a very peculiar thing. I waited until this section had been read. No one offered to strike it out; no one offered to amend it. It contains this provision with reference to the President being authorized to designate an officer of the Engineer Corps in relation to the New York Joint Harbor Lines Commission:

That the officer so designated shall perform his duties as member of the commission without interference with his regular duties, and that he shall receive no additional compensation from any source on account of his service on such commission except such reimbursement of his expenses for other travel with the commission as may be provided by the States aforesaid.

This was about to be agreed to by unanimous consent, having passed through one of the ablest committees of this House, and was about to pass the House without any question. Only within a week this House agreed to an amendment inserted by the Senate in a House joint resolution on this same subject, giving the President the same power named in this section, and this joint resolution, which has now gone to the President for his signature, contains this language, which was also agreed to by unanimous consent:

And the officer designated may receive such compensation for his services on said commission as may be provided by the States aforesaid.

One day we pass a joint resolution authorizing the President to designate an engineer officer to serve on a joint commission and authorize him to receive additional compensation. That is passed by unanimous consent. The next day we pass the same thing and provide that he shall not receive additional compensation, and that is passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIDSON. The mistake was in passing the first one.

Mr. MANN. This matter has already passed both Houses and gone to the President for his signature, and it seems to me it would somewhat complicate matters to pass a resolution one day stating that the authorities should be given an officer who shall receive additional compensation and the next that he shall not receive any additional compensation. I make the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman realize that it has been pretty well demonstrated that it is impossible to change a line of this bill and that Members have got discouraged?

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman will see it done now.

Mr. MONDELL. By the masterly hand of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. There is no trouble when you know how.

Mr. MANN. I am not criticizing the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, I am only calling attention to this legislation to show its peculiarities.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, there are many things that go through this House that I know nothing about. I am sorry to make the admission, but it is true. This bill was reported before the provision had passed to which the gentleman from Illinois has just referred.

Mr. MANN. On the contrary, if the gentleman will pardon me, the House joint resolution passed the House on August 19, 1912. It passed the Senate only a few days ago, and the House within a week agreed to the Senate amendment, which consisted in striking out the preamble. I will state frankly to the gentleman from Florida that I think the provision in the bill is better than the provision in the joint resolution.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the provision going out.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 59, after line 13, by adding the following as a separate paragraph:

"Improvement of the Wabash River and Little Wabash River, Ill., $200,000, for the purpose of deepening and widening the channel of said rivers."

The CHAIRMAN. Is this a new paragraph?

Mr. FOWLER. It was intended to follow the section that has gone out, but inasmuch as it has gone out I offer it as a separate paragraph after section 10.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware of the fact that a commission some two years ago was appointed for the purpose of surveying the Wabash River and for the purpose of determining the advisability of improving it on an extensive scale. I am also aware of the fact that there was a provision in the bill during the last session of Congress for the purpose of surveying the Little Wabash River. The survey which was ordered two years ago for the Wabash has not yet been made by the engineers, and the survey on the Little Wabash ordered during the last session of Congress to a certain extent has been made. I have not been able to see it, for it has been so recent.

But, Mr. Chairman, in view of the great amount of territory which would receive the benefit from the improvements of the Wabash and the Little Wabash Rivers, I think that this sum of money ought to be appropriated for the purpose of giving relief. These great waterways drain half of two States. In fact, they run through a territory which is second to none in the world in productivity. It is one of the finest corn belts that is known to man, and some of the finest corn in the world is produced in that section of the country. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, there are ears of corn which grow in that belt 15 inches long, and will compare favorably in size to that of any other corn in the world. That being the case, Mr. Chairman, I insist that this committee ought to give some attention to the improvement of these great waterways.

I say this, Mr. Chairman, in all earnestness. I do not know whether my remarks will appeal to this committee with any degree of consistency or not. I am aware that the committee is a close corporation, and I know that it is the history of legislation during my short period in Congress that it is done by committees and not by Congress, as a rule. These committees are governed largely by the reports of heads of departments, and whatever may be done here, it must first get the brand of approval from a department before any action will be taken by the committee.

And once the report of a committee is filed, once a bill is brought in the House by a committee, an amendment offered to it upon the floor of the House for the purpose of getting meritorious relief to a worthy project is regarded as a most rebellious deed on the part of the little fellow who comes from a country district. I am aware, Mr. Chairman, of the fact that daggers for this amendment are held by the members of this committee, that they are thick in this House, ready to stab it to death as soon as it may be put to a vote. I know that the itching palm of every one of the members of this committee is not only eager to close its grasp upon the handle of the dagger, but just as soon as the amendment is put to a vote by the Chair up will rise as many daggers in the air as there are members of this committee, and at the same time the fatal, deadly blow will be struck, and what Julius Cæsar received at the hands of Cassius and his coconspirators will be nothing but flesh-wounds as compared with the bloody butchery which you have planned for this innocent but meritorious amendment. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

By unanimous consent, Mr. FOWLER was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it proper to proceed now with amendments as offered or to revert to the matters left over?

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, it is my intention to submit a request for unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair takes it that it is in order to proceed to the consideration of any independent section.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, it is always in order to ask unanimous consent, and it is for unanimous consent I now ask to return to page 5, line 17 of the bill, and to present the amendment which I have sent to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to return to the page indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I object, for the reason that I want to offer an amendment. I will reserve the right to object and state that I want to offer an amendment at the conclusion of the bill. If I will not lose my rights by the House going back to some other part of the bill, I shall not object, but I want to offer an amendment at the conclusion of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks now is the time to do that.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. CALLAWAY. For the time being. I do not want to lose any of my rights. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the period after the last word of the bill, inserting a colon, and add:

"Provided further, That no part of the appropriations in this bill shall be used for any purpose whatsoever except for maintenance of existing projects."

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I see from this report that it will take only $2,222,650 to maintain all of the projects that we now have. The Democratic Party came in preaching economy. This Congress, if it keeps on at the rate it is going, will expend more money than any previous Congress. By adopting this amendment we can cut out over $38,000,000 on this particular bill, and that will be a proof to the people of this country that we mean what we say. It will be in accordance with genuine statesmanship; it will be a genuine economy. There has been no showing on this floor by anyone, not even a contention, that a dollar of the new expenditure provided in this bill is an investment that would be worth anything to the Nation or that could be expected to produce a return on the investment. This is not doing away with or letting go down a single project that we have, though we have wasted millions of money. We ought here and now to adopt a different policy from that we have been following under the Republican lead. We as Democrats ought to expend the public money only when there is a showing by the committee that the investment is such an investment as a reasonable man in the conduct of his own business would make and not simply a pork-barrel proposition handed out to different men in different sections of the country to get them to come in and support a raid on the Treasury which is absolutely indefensible.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. Would it be the gentleman's idea it would be economical now to discontinue a project, for instance, the improvement of a river that is to be improved, say, with 20 dams, 10 of which have been built and 10 remaining, not to provide anything for the remaining construction?

Mr. CALLAWAY. It would be unless there is a showing by the committee or some member of the committee or somebody in a report or somewhere or somehow that it is a good proposition for the Government to go on and conclude. There has been no statement or showing here of a single project that we are now working on or beginning. It looks reasonable to me that we should keep what we have, protect what we have completed, and let it add as much to commerce as it will, but until there is some conclusive showing that it is right and proper and economical and a good investment to spend more money I would not go further. I would cut this pork-barrel business out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, I now ask unanimous consent to take up the amendment I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to return to——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to hear some explanation of what the gentleman's amendment proposed to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 17, on page 5, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"Improvement of the Hudson (North) River channels of the harbor of New York, N. Y., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 719, Sixty-second Congress, second session, $200,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War may enter into a contract or contracts for such materials and work as may be necessary to complete the said project, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law not to exceed in the aggregate $1,370,000, exclusive of the amounts herein and heretofore appropriated."

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. HAMILL. Will the gentleman withhold his objection until I can explain the amendment?

Mr. EDWARDS. It will be useless to do so. I will finally object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. EDWARDS. I will reserve the right to object if the chairman [Mr. SPARKMAN] wishes it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman reserve the right to object, or does he object now?

Mr. EDWARDS. I reserve the right to object temporarily.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, I do hope this amendment will carry, because it contains a very worthy legislative proposition. The improvement which my amendment contemplates is the dredging and deepening of the westerly side of the Hudson River, in front of Jersey City and of Hoboken and several municipalities north of it. In conjunction with my colleague from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD] I introduced a bill on this subject at the beginning of the present session.

The facts are these: This amendment contemplates an improvement by dredging from Cummunipaw to Fort Lee, a distance of about 11 miles, making available for several miles shore front suitable for the erection of docks and piers to accommodate the shipping now crying for accommodations at this port. This improvement is right opposite Manhattan and at the point where the seven great trunk lines have their terminals. Freight and the commerce of the Nation can be handled much more cheaply and readily than anywhere else in this great port—the greatest on earth—for the reason that the goods are on their way either to Europe or other ports of the world; and if it is merchandise arriving, it is on its way for distribution anywhere in the United States from cars to steamships and directly from steamships to cars.

This development will have a great tendency to wipe out this lighterage charge of 60 cents per ton on every carload of freight coming to New York, which would benefit every agriculturist and manufacturer whose products would come to or be shipped through New York.

The benefits to be derived are continent wide.

This particular area of water front, which can be made so much more valuable to all the people of the United States, has never had one dollar of Government money, except away back in 1875, when $25,000 was voted to take out a shoal in front of Jersey City.

Going back and looking over the appropriations of the rivers and harbors for the last 30 years, New York (and this is a part of New York Harbor) has never had anything like its fair share of such moneys, especially when you take into consideration its towering importance as a port.

Since the Government was established (see Doc. No. 382, 62d Cong., 2d sess.)—

New York Harbor has had	$6,979,622.14
Boston Harbor has had	10,402,687.45
Charleston Harbor has had	4,925,191.67
Savannah Harbor has had	8,443,703.28
St. Johns River, Fla., has had	4,813,003.75
Mobile Bay and Harbor has had	5,870,652.43
Galveston Harbor has had	9,416,934.72
Cleveland Harbor has had	6,659,618.31
Detroit River has had	9,700,283.05
Oakland Harbor, Cal., has had	3,476,769.60
San Pedro Harbor has had	2,784,492.20

The port of New York collects about a million dollars a day in duties, and so forth, which is more than all the other ports combined. In passengers and freight to and from other ports this holds good also, and to sum it all up it is the peerless and incomparable port of this country, and the only way to maintain it is to furnish the facilities that the great strides in shipping and business demand and must have.

I do believe that on grounds of national pride, as a matter of fact, on grounds of national interest, inasmuch as the receipts of New York Harbor are a great asset in the Treasury of the United States for the payment of the Nation's bills, this committee ought to adopt and this House ratify its action by incorporating my amendment in the bill under discussion and granting the sum of money provided in it. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask now that the committee go back to the items that have been passed.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, we will return to the items passed and not considered. The Clerk will report the first item, on page 9.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Woodbury Creek, N. J., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 635, Sixty-second Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $8,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 10, line 3, by inserting: "Improving Frankford Creek, Philadelphia, $15,000."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the discussion on Frankford Creek the other day leads to the belief that the committee is willing to relent upon this proposition. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], in discussing the matter with me on the floor on Saturday, indicated that it would be a waste of time to ask for a survey of Frankford Creek, in that it had already been surveyed and the merits of the proposition were understood both by the engineers and by the committee.

Now, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN], chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, has indicated in answer to certain questions that there are many instances in which appropriations are made for the improvement of rivers that bisect cities, I think the time has come fairly and squarely to ask the committee to make the appropriation which the Government itself has asked, which is positively needful in this vicinity for the improvement of commerce.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this bill is no more remarkable for many of the items that it contains than it is by reason of the fact that it does not contain items that it should contain. It is full of appropriations for lonesome harbors and way-back creeks, and here is a proposition having to do with the commerce of the American people as a whole, which ought to be in the bill and is not. The gentleman from New Jersey——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the matter now being discussed by the gentleman is not before the House, and I make the point of order that he must confine himself to the amendment under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] raises the point of order that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is not confining himself to the amendment. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the item which is offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], like the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL], has to do with the commerce of the American people. In the case of the New Jersey item it has been shown that 75,000,000 tons of commerce per annum pays a lighterage charge of at least 3 cents a hundred, or 60 cents a ton, because we refuse to appropriate a million or a million and a half to make it possible to unload the commerce of the country going west on the west bank rather than the east bank of the North or Hudson River. Millions of tons of freight going into the Mississippi River Valley and into the mountain States has for years paid these charges; the country in which I live every year pays a tribute to the lighterage business across this great river because, forsooth, this Congress can not expend the people's money for the people's business, but must expend it for the protection of private property along rivers, for the purpose of dredging out creeks upon which there never has been and never will be commerce, and for the purpose of improving alleged harbors that never have seen and never will see any considerable commerce.

If there has ever been an item offered to an appropriation bill of this character that ought to be adopted, it is the item offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]; and the item offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL] is quite as meritorious, if not more so.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman first if he has read the report on the item offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MONDELL. I have not read all the reports on all of these items, but I do know a good deal about the item referred to by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL], which the committee turned down, just as it will turn down the item offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. SPARKMAN. Has the gentleman read the report?

Mr. MONDELL. They all suffer the same treatment at the hands of the committee.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has read the report on the item of the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know that I have read the report to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey, I should say.

Mr. MONDELL. But it is quite enough for me to know——

Mr. SPARKMAN. That he offered it.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not have to read the engineers' reports in order to know that there are hundreds of millions of tons of freight unloaded on the east side of the Hudson River at the harbor of New York that ought to be unloaded on the west side, and if the chairman of this committee does not know that, there is a fundamental proposition in regard to river and harbor business that it would be well for him to become acquainted with, because everybody else knows about it. We are spending the people's money to dredge out "Way Back Creek," where there is no commerce, while refusing to spend money where it is needed for carrying the commerce of the American people.

Mr. Chairman, we are about to complete the consideration of this bill. During the debate I have made some observations in regard to some of these items. I desire that my position shall not be misunderstood. I am in favor of liberal river and harbor appropriations. I have always been of that mind, and what I have said has been for the purpose of calling attention to items which discredit this great work and render it difficult to secure appropriations for worthy objects. I am in position to be impartial in these matters. The people whom I represent are favorable to proper expenditures for these purposes, and yet we have no selfish interest in any item in the bill.

I desire to be fair and not overcritical, and yet I feel justified in saying that the committee has failed in its duty to the House and country in not printing its hearings and in not making a detailed report. The measly report of 10 pages conveys but little information, and if one wants to be informed they must search through numerous volumes of the reports of engineers, and then we would have only one side of the question and still lack the facts which can only be secured by reading the reports of the hearings. Is the committee afraid or only indifferent? Is the committee so sure of the votes secured by a system of judicious apportionment of benefits as to feel entirely independent of the views of Members?

I am in favor, as I have said, of liberal appropriations for rivers and harbors. Where there is commerce or commerce can be created I am not only favorable to improvements helpful to the general commerce of the country, but I do not object to those projects which only serve local interest if it is clear that the expenditure will in fact give facilities which will be utilized. I object to expenditures which can not and will not increase the water-borne commerce of the country or cheapen the cost of transportation to the people. That there are some items of that kind in this bill no one can deny; the only difference of opinion is as to the number of such items.

On the Mississippi we are spending vast sums on the theory, as stated by the gentleman from Louisiana, that the levees are an aid to navigation. The fact is they are of little, if any, aid, but so long as we build and maintain them on the theory they are we shall waste most of our money. I will join in a plan to make our expenditures on the Mississippi and Missouri really effective, but to do it we must first frankly acknowledge we are proposing to protect private property. My criticisms of this bill are in the hope that a system of false pretense and wasteful expenditure based on it may be abandoned for one of frankness and really helpful and useful expenditure.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 5, noes 58.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by having published in the RECORD an article in the Outlook of January 25, 1913, in regard to New York Harbor.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request? Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The article is as follows:

NEW YORK HARBOR.

Since 1767 the width of the Hudson River opposite New York City has ben narrowed nearly 50 per cent. This has all been done by successive encroachments of the pierhead line into the fairway. Every few years an agitation would spring up, and the shore would be built farther out into the river and the pierhead line advanced still farther until now the river is only 2,795 feet wide at its narrowest point, opposite Castle Point, Hoboken. This has several bad effects upon navigation.

First. It greatly increases the current at this point in the Hudson River itself and thus requires higher and more expensive power in the vessels navigating it, and it also makes navigation more difficult.

Second. Another bad effect is the crowding of traffic in the river. One hundred and twenty boats have been counted as passing this section in a single hour in the winter season when no excursion boats are running and when navigation in the upper Hudson is closed, so this probably represents a fair daily average.

Third. The obstruction caused by this narrowing of the Hudson at New York tends to reduce the ebb and flow of the tide throughout the length of the Hudson River, and, according to the engineers, is even now responsible for deterioration of navigable depth in the upper and middle Hudson.

The city of New York depends vitally upon the preservation of this great waterway. The commerce on this river, instead of decreasing, is rapidly increasing in size and number of vessels. Any material impairment of it will greatly tend to cripple the future commercial prosperity of the city.

The congestion of the water front of the city does not come from the demands of its ocean commerce, but from the demands made upon it by a species of traffic which has no business on the water front, namely, the use of the water front as distributing terminals for the New Jersey railways. These railway companies occupy, with their terminals, large sections on both sides of the river. Their tracks run down to the New Jersey shore, where their cars are put upon floats and carried across the river to the New York shore. There the bulk of the freight is broken and distributed into drays on the piers themselves and on West Street. This work of distribution is a work which does not need to be performed upon the water front; the freight thus distributed is not going abroad, but is being distributed—most of it—in New York City. If, instead of this wasteful method, these freight cars were either carried under the river by tunnels and then distributed by a marginal railway into terminal buildings for distribution into trucks, or even if they were carried across the river by floats to the terminus of such a distributing railway, 30 or 40 per cent of our Hudson River Manhattan water front would be released at once for its true function of serving as a terminus for ocean-going traffic.

The problem of the New York water front therefore is, in the first place, to restrict it as far as possible to its proper function of serving ocean traffic. It is a splendid water front, with deep water and an unsurpassed fairway, provided we do not spoil it.

There has been no difference of opinion on the part of any careful students as to the wisdom of any further narrowing of the fairway of the Hudson River. In 1857 the matter was carefully studied by a board of engineers acting for the State of New York, who set out all of the foregoing objections to any further narrowing of the river. At the time of their report the river was still 500 feet wider than it is now. This reduction has taken place under the same heedless and selfish pressure which is now being brought to narrow it still further. It was narrowed in 1871, in 1890, and again in 1897 under precisely the same cry of emergency which is being raised now. On December 9, 1903, when a similar agitation was raised, Secretary of War Root gave notice that no further encroachment on the fairway would be permitted, and that any further extensions in the length of piers must be made by digging back into the land rather than by stretching out into the river. Three later Secretaries have taken the same ground.

So far as our ocean-going traffic is concerned, the pressure for long piers has arisen thus far simply because it has been cheaper to build out into the river than to dig back into the land. People have preferred to encroach upon the fairway rather than to spend the necessary money to preserve it. We have reached a point where such an attitude is no longer possible or defensible. The city must recognize that the preservation of its primacy in commerce depends upon intelligently attacking these two features of the problem. It must insist upon a proper distribution of its local freight, and it must insist that in future piers the requisite length be attained in a way consonant with the preservation of the river, even if it requires more money to do it.

The vice of the Sulzer bill now before Congress is that, so far from intelligently grappling with these problems, it again seeks to move our pierhead line out into the river. It is a weak yielding to the interested pressure of those who desire to get long piers at the smallest expense and without reference to the insidious but gradual effect upon the city's future. Furthermore, it is an attempt to take out of the hands of the board of engineers a function which they are best suited to perform and to have it done in a much less careful way by Congress. The pierhead line is now in the hands of a board of three engineers known as the harbor line board, who have been making and are at the present time making a careful study of this very question. To pass the Sulzer bill would be to anticipate and foreclose their decision.

Some readers may ask, How does this matter concern the people of inland States and cities? Why trouble us about it? We have problems enough of our own. Let New York settle her own difficulties herself.

The answer is that foreign commerce, coastwise commerce, and transcontinental railway shipments are matters of vital national interest. New York has the most important harbor in the United States; it is the greatest commercial metropolis in the United States; it is the greatest distributing point in the United States. If it does its work inefficiently or expensively the whole country suffers.

In this article we have pointed out defects to be avoided. In a later article we shall describe some definite and scientific plans of harbor improvement.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to return to page 14 and offer an amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Under the order for passing over, is it not in order to return to the pages we passed?

The CHAIRMAN. That is what we are doing now.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I understood we were returning to the items that had been passed over before. We passed this item on page 14, the page where we now are.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. We are now on page 10.

Mr. MANN. We have passed that over.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to the item on page 14, providing for the improvement of the inland waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion was made to return to items on pages previous to the paragraph on page 14, and under the order already made we will take them in the order as they come. The Clerk will report the next item that was passed over.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, let me state to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] that the particular item that he desires to return to is the item brought up the other day and discussed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL]. It pertains to his district, and he discussed it very fully; and after the discussion the House adopted it. The gentleman from North Carolina has now, under press of important business, left the city, and is not here. I hope the gentleman from Texas will not insist on returning to that paragraph.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I can not. [Cries of "Read!" "Read!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Delaware River, Pa., N. J., and Del.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance from Allegheny Avenue, Philadelphia, to the sea, $1,750,000; for maintenance of improvement from Allegheny Avenue, Philadelphia, to Laylor Street, Trenton, $20,000; and completing improvement above Laylor Street, Trenton, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 839, Sixty-first Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions recommended by the Chief of Engineers on page 2 of said document, $114,000; in all, $1,884,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, line 6, after the word "sea," strike out "$1,750,000" and insert "$2,000,000," and on line 14, strike out "$1,884,000" and insert "$2,134,000."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to induce the committee, if possible, to fix the appropriation for the 35-foot channel in the Delaware River in accordance with the recommendations of the United States Army engineers and in conformity with the plan which contemplates the completion of that channel within six years. An argument has just been made upon another item which indicates that the port of New York is asking for increased facilities; and it is a fact that has been brought out during the last three or four days in the discussion of this bill that the port of New York now has a depth of 40 feet for incoming vessels; that the port of Boston has 35 feet and is asking and will receive through this bill a survey for 40 feet for its harbor; that Boston and Baltimore already have 35 feet, and that Norfolk is substantially at a 35-foot stage.

The city of Philadelphia is 100 miles up the river and bay from the sea, 60 miles from the deep water of the bay. It is without question the greatest revenue-producing inland river of the United States. Last year at Philadelphia there was collected $21,000,000 of revenue, in a customhouse for which no appropriation has been made in the way of improvements for 70 years. We have been asking that the channel of the Delaware River be improved, and in 1910 the first appropriation was made upon a 35-foot channel project, which contemplates placing the city of Philadelphia, with its million and a half of population, upon an equality at least with the city of Baltimore and with the city of Boston. How long it will take for us to catch up to those two cities now, I know not. It will take us centuries at the present rate of appropriations to catch up to the great metropolis of New York; and so long as New York keeps deepening its harbor and the volume of business increases there, so long the monopolies in shipping will increase, because the great bottoms are now being floated upon the high seas, putting out of business the coastwise trade and the smaller craft, and concentrating everything in the way of commerce and navigation at this one port.

If you gentlemen can fairly and decently ask for appropriations for the Mississippi and for the improvement of inland ports, harbors, and waterways, you must excuse us if we become a little insistent in asking that the project you have approved be completed, so that we may at least keep in business on the great Delaware River.

When the 35-foot channel project was adopted in June, 1910, two and a half years ago, it was estimated that the total cost would be $10,920,000; that the maintenance cost would be $300,000, and that appropriations would be made with a view to completion in six years. This was conceded to be due to the great city of Philadelphia and the other cities along the Delaware, producing in 1912 customs revenues in excess of $21,000,000, and an average annual revenue of about $20,000,000 for the last 10 years, or twice in one year what is necessary to give us a good channel for all time. In 1910 we were given $1,500,000 to complete the 30-foot channel and commence work on the 35-foot project, and for 1911–12, $1,300,000 to continue the improvement up to March 4, 1913.

The work done on the 35-foot channel to the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, as reported by the engineers, is 6 per cent of the whole project. The engineers have urged appropriations "to permit a rapid prosecution of the work," and the Chief of Engineers in his estimate declares that—

For the year 1914 the appropriation should not be less than $2,500,000, of which approximately one-half should be in cash; but unless continuing-contract authorization be made, the appropriation should be not less than $2,000,000 in cash.

Of the amount estimated as a profitable expenditure in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, it is proposed to apply $300,000 to maintenance of the existing channel, and the balance to new work of rock removal, dredging, and dike construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that I may have at least five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, what has the committee reported? For the Mississippi, whose commerce amounted in 1907 to 4,300,000 tons on the whole 2,500 miles from the Lakes to the Gulf, as against 27,000,000 tons in that year upon the 60 miles of the Delaware alone—for the Mississippi, in this bill, you have appropriated $9,185,000; for the Ohio, $5,550,000; for the Missouri, $2,300,000; a total virtually of $17,000,000, which, if you add the appropriations made to the other tributaries of the Mississippi, will give that stream alone, out of the $40,000,000 you appropriated in this bill, one-half of the total appropriation made for this year.

This bill cuts the Delaware River appropriation from $2,000,000, the minimum asked by the engineers as urgent, to $1,750,000, not for one year, but for 16 months, from March 5, 1913, to June 30, 1914. On this long-term basis the annual appropriation is reduced $337,000 for the extra four months, in addition to the $40,000 that must be deducted for maintenance. Instead of the $2,000,000 recommended by the engineers, therefore, the Delaware River for the next fiscal year will receive but $1,013,000, a rate that will probably postpone the completion of the 35-foot channel for at least 10 years.

In view of the committee's fair and liberal treatment of the other inland waterways of the country, it seems to me that instead of postponing this project of the Delaware, the purpose of which is to put us upon an equality with other great ports along the Atlantic seaboard, you should let up in this instance and give this, the greatest business-getting, revenue-producing river of the United States, the $2,000,000 which was the least asked for by the Chief of Engineers in his report.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I should be much pleased if we could see our way clear to accept the gentleman's amendment. I am convinced that the Delaware River, the portions both above and below Philadelphia, is a very important artery of commerce, and the projects for its improvement should be completed as early as practicable; but we have done in this bill all that the engineers have requested us to do at this time. We are appropriating $1,750,000, which, together with what will go in the sundry civil bill, makes the $2,000,000 that the engineers recommend. It is true that in their report they suggest, as they have suggested in other reports, that a continuous contract be provided for $500,000 more. But they say that if this can not be done we should give the amount—I am not quoting the exact language—which would make, with the $250,000 recommended for the sundry civil bill, $2,000,000. The language actually used is as follows:

> For the year 1914 the appropriations should not be less than $2,500,000, of which approximately one-half should be in cash, but unless in the continuing contract authorization be made, the appropriation should be of not less than $2,000,000 in cash.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, we appropriate in this bill $1,750,000. The engineers estimate $250,000 for the sundry civil bill, which makes up the $2,000,000 in cash.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. In a moment. So that if we should make this additional cash appropriation we would do something the engineers did not ask.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The $250,000 was left over from last year?

Mr. BURGESS. No; that is in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That carries the work up to March 4.

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; that is where the gentleman is mistaken. The recommendation is made to cover the longer period of time. Nineteen hundred and fourteen can only mean one of two things. It can only mean the fiscal year ending the 30th of June or the calendar year ending the 31st of December. We are not contending that it does the latter. We take the shorter period of time and are appropriating to cover the period from the 4th of March of this year until approximately the 30th of June next year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The appropriation provided for in this bill begins as of March 5, 1913.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Well, no; the 4th of March, not later.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would aggregate $400,000 for maintenance—$300,000 for the year—and then there is another quarter.

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; not in the sense the gentleman is contending. There was a newspaper statement to that effect, I believe—and I am not criticizing the gentleman, because I know newspapers perform great service in the world, and I do not object to the gentleman getting into the newspapers as often as he can.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is now touching on a delicate question. If he will confine himself to the facts——

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am going to do that, but I wanted to allude to an injustice done the committee by a Philadelphia newspaper, and I do not think it was intentional——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say to the gentleman that I will not discuss matters in the House one way or the other concerning the way the gentleman from Florida or the gentleman from Georgia or any other Member gets into print. I want to know whether we are to be fairly treated in this commercial transaction when Philadelphia presents her claims based upon commercial merit.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Somebody was discussed a few days ago in this connection, and I have no objection to being discussed to-morrow, though I am not seeking newspaper notoriety.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know the gentleman is not.

Mr. SPARKMAN. What I call the gentleman's attention to is that I saw in the newspaper a statement that I know is an injustice to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, because pursuing the same line of argument that the gentleman from Pennsylvania pursues, it makes almost the same statement that the gentleman made the other day about the amounts proposed in this bill for the allowance, and it asserts that $400,000 of the amount would be used for maintenance. Now, the facts are that the engineers only recommend $300,000, and not $400,000, for maintenance to cover the very period of time to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would be 16 months. That is my point.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Well, it is practically that, but it is what the engineers recommend. Whether it be 24 months or 5 years, it is what the engineers recommend. We have given the full amount recommended by the engineers for maintenance and for the improvement of the river, whether it is 4 months or 12 or 16 months.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I accept the gentleman's statement, but I can not harmonize it with the report of the engineers on page 288, in which a maximum of $2,500,000 is asked and a minimum of $2,000,000.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, that was the recommendation in case we provided a continuing contract, but we did not provide for that. True, the report says that for the year 1914 the appropriation should be not less than $2,500,000, but the engineers confuse the word "appropriation" with the word "authorization," as the next line will show—

> But unless continuing contract authorization be made—

The report goes on to say—> the appropriation should not be less than $2,000,000 in cash—

Which, together with the $1,750,000 appropriated in this bill and the $250,000 to come in the sundry civil, makes the cash appropriations without any authorizations $2,000,000. At the bottom of the report in a note there is this statement:

> Of the amount, $250,000 is for continuing contracts.

That is, of the amount of $2,000,000 recommended $250,000 is to go into the sundry civil bill.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say another thing for the benefit of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and of the committee, that in doing work like we are doing in the Delaware River the matter of maintenance does not amount to so much as in other streams where the work has been completed, because in many places, if not in all, the work of improving the river takes care of the maintenance.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. As has been stated by Mr. SPARKMAN, the full amount that can be profitably used, according to the information given by the Government engineers, up until June 30, 1914, is $2,000,000. This bill carries cash of $1,750,000, and the sundry civil bill carries cash of $250,000 additional. No part of the sundry civil appropriation of $250,000 can be used before March 4 of this year. When the sundry civil bill was up last year, and it did not carry the full amount of $700,000 that I expected it to carry for the Delaware, I inquired as to the reason for cutting it to $450,000, and was informed that it was because the engineers could not use more than $450,000 before March 4, 1913. That statement was later corroborated by the engineers.

It may be inexplicable to the members of this committee why my good friend from Philadelphia, Mr. MOORE, has taken occasion to do what he has done to-day. The engineers say that we are appropriating the full amount that they can use, and everyone here knows that we can not get any more than the engineers recommend; and yet here is a motion to increase the amount for the Delaware River and another motion to put in an appropriation for the Frankford Creek, for which no recommendation has been made by the engineers. Everyone knows that we can get no appropriation until we have the approval of the engineers. The Frankford Creek, Mr. Chairman, is in my district. Every inch of it is there. When the cleverly juggled stories go to the Philadelphia newspapers they will read well at home. They will show that my distinguished colleague endeavored to get an appropriation for Frankford Creek which was evidently neglected by the Member from that district of Philadelphia who is on the inside on the committee. [Laughter.] Is there a Member in this House who would stoop to such political methods as these for the purpose of reflecting upon anyone else? I wish we could get $5,000,000 for the Delaware River. The engineers say that after this appropriation of $2,000,000 it will require $6,000,000 to complete the work of the 35-foot channel. If we appropriate $2,000,000 annually, as we are doing now, it will be completed within four years, notwithstanding the fact that the newspapers in Philadelphia have quoted the distinguished exponent of waterways, Mr. MOORE, as saying it will take 10 years to complete that job. I am very glad of this opportunity of clearing the atmosphere to that extent. My good friend does not expect to get any of these amendments through, but it will make splendid reading for the people at home. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 3, noes 51.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Choked off again!

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MOON of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 28180) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 210. Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint a member of the New Jersey and New York Joint Harbor Line Commission;

H. J. Res. 380. Joint resolution authorizing the granting of permits to the committee on inaugural ceremonies on the occasion of the inauguration of the President elect on March 4, 1913, etc.; and

H. R. 23451. An act to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

S. 6380. An act to incorporate the American Hospital of Paris;

S. 2666. An act granting an increase of pension to William P. Clark; and

S. J. Res. 145. Joint resolution to provide for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property in connection with the presidential inaugural ceremonies in 1913.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate concurrent resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Senate concurrent resolution 33.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there shall be printed and bound in cloth, with accompanying maps, 4,000 copies of the report upon Panama Canal Traffic and Tolls, prepared for the President, by Emory R. Johnson, special commissioner on traffic and tolls; that the copies here ordered shall be printed from plates recently prepared for the Isthmian Canal Commission and now in the possession of the Government Printing Office; and that of the copies printed 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 for the use of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER. The newly elected Member from the State of Arkansas, Hon. SAM M. TAYLOR, presents himself with credentials which are regular. Unless there is objection, the Chair will swear him in.

Mr. TAYLOR appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill and joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 210. Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint a member of the New Jersey and New York Joint Harbor Line Commission; and

H. R. 23451. An act to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, the Senate has disagreed to the conference report on the immigration bill (S. 3175) and asks for a further conference. I move that the House insist upon its amendment and agree to a further conference.

Mr. MANN. Are the papers here?

The SPEAKER. The papers are here. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] moves that the House further insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BURNETT, Mr. SABATH, and Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts.

DEATH OF HON. S. C. SMITH.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to announce to the House the death of the Hon. SYLVESTER CLARK SMITH, a Representative from the State of California. During the lifetime of Mr. SMITH he requested in the event of his death while a Member of the House that there be no committee appointed to attend his funeral. I have therefore omitted from the resolutions which I have offered any reference to a committee. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions and move their adoption.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 797.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. SYLVESTER CLARK SMITH, a Representative from the State of California.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Tuesday, January 28, 1913, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of State amending his estimate for an appropriation to investigate the opium, morphine, and other allied drug evils (H. Doc. No. 1305); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 28, 1913.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CULBERSON and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ELECTORS FOR PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. GALLINGER) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting, pursuant to law, an authentic copy of the certificate of the final ascertainment of electors for President and Vice President appointed in the State of Wisconsin at the election held therein on November 5, 1912, which was ordered to be filed.

IMPRISONMENTS IN THE ARMY AND NAVY (S. DOC. NO. 1039).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 7th instant, certain information relative to the number of persons serving in the Army and Navy imprisoned during the year 1912, the terms of sentence, location and nature of places of incarceration, the nature of offenses, etc., which, on motion of Mr. WORKS, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CULLOM presented a resolution adopted by members of the Monday Study Club, of Rock Island, Ill., against the transfer of the control of the national forests to the several States, which was referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game..

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Board of Trade of Springfield, Mass., favoring an appropriation for the improvement of the Connecticut River from Long Island Sound to Holyoke, in that State, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WORKS presented a memorial of the Humboldt Chamber of Commerce, of Eureka, Cal., remonstrating against the repeal of the oleomargarine law, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of the congregation of the Seventh-day Adventist Church of Good Thunder, Minn., and a memorial of the congregation of the Seventh-day Adventist Church of Amboy, Minn., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation compelling the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

PROOF OF SIGNATURES.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 20102) relating to proof of signatures and handwriting, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1162) thereon.

COURTS IN TEXAS.

Mr. CULBERSON. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 24194) to create a new division of the western judicial district of Texas and to provide for terms of court at Pecos, Tex., and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 1161) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that the counties of Reeves, Ward, Martin, Reagan, Winkler, Ector, Gaines, Andrews, Upton, Midland, Loving, Jeff Davis, and Crane shall constitute a division of the western judicial district of Texas.

Section 2 provides that terms of the district court of the United States for the western district of Texas shall be held twice in each year at the city of Pecos, in Reeves County, and that, until otherwise provided by law, the judge of that court shall fix the times at which the court shall be held at Pecos, of which he shall make proclamation and give due notice. But suitable rooms and accommodations shall be furnished for the holding of the court and for the use of the officers of the court at Pecos free of expense to the Government of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. THOMAS:

A bill (S. 8293) authorizing the construction of a public building in the city of Durango, Colo.; and

A bill (S. 8294) to acquire a site for the erection of a public building at Montrose, Colo.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. GRONNA:

A bill (S. 8295) granting an increase of pension to Charles Shattuck (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 8296) granting a pension to Edward M. Stevens (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BRYAN submitted an amendment providing for the survey of a channel at Mosquito Inlet, Fla., with suitable depth and width from the Atlantic Ocean to a point at or near the town of New Smyrna, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MYERS submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the investigation of miscellaneous insects from $30,000 to $55,000, and providing that the sum of $25,000 be used to investigate the Rocky Mountain spotted-fever tick, intended to be proposed by him to the Agriculture appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment providing that appropriations for the Life-Saving Service may be used in payment of expenses that may be incurred by the Life-Saving Service by express direction of the Secretary of the Treasury in saving life and property on occasion of floods in any navigable waters of the United States, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment providing that in computing the length of service which shall entitle warrant and petty officers to longevity pay under the eighth section of the act of April 16, 1908, all service rendered under the official designation of "pilot" in the Revenue-Cutter Service shall be included, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

JAMES F. SELLERS.

Mr. PENROSE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 444), which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to appoint James F. Sellers an additional messenger, who shall be paid at the rate of $1,200 per annum from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, until otherwise provided for by law.

MEMORIAL SERVICES FOR THE LATE VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution 435, a resolution submitted by me and reported yesterday from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS].

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, the 15th day of February, be set apart for appropriate exercises in commemoration of the life, character, and public service of the late JAMES S. SHERMAN, Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate of the United States.

That a committee of three Senators, composed of ELIHU ROOT, JAMES A. O'GORMAN, and CHARLES CURTIS, is hereby appointed, with full power to make all arrangements and publish a suitable program for the aforesaid meeting of the Senate, and to issue the invitations hereinafter mentioned.

That invitations shall be extended to the President of the United States, the members of the Cabinet, the Chief Justice and Justices of the Supreme Court, the Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, the judges of the Commerce Court, the judges of the Court of Customs Appeals, the judges of the courts of the District of Columbia, the officers of the Army and Navy stationed in Washington, the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the members of the Civil Service Commission. That such other invitations shall be issued as to the said committee shall seem best.

All expenses incurred by the committee in the execution of this order shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

CONTRIBUTIONS FOR CAMPAIGN PURPOSES.

Mr. JONES. Yesterday the chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate reported Senate resolution No. 418 amending Senate resolution No. 79, agreed to August 26, 1912, and this morning the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] requested me to call it up and have it passed by the Senate. However, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] is interested in the resolution and at one time objected to its passage. So I will not call it up this morning in the absence of that Senator, but I desire to state that either the junior Senator from Minnesota or myself will try to have the resolution passed by the Senate to-morrow.

IMMIGRATION OF ALIENS.

Mr. LODGE. I ask to have printed, for the convenience of the Senate, the report of the committee of conference on the immigration bill, as finally agreed upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE WEDEMEYER.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to give notice that on Saturday, February 22, I shall ask the Senate to consider resolutions commemorative of the life and public services of Hon. WILLIAM W. WEDEMEYER, late a Representative from the State of Michigan.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 28, 1913.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We recognize Thee, O God our Father, not only as the Creator of the universe, but the upholder and sustainer of all things, and that Thy will is not only supreme but is good will. Help us, therefore, we beseech Thee, to "work out what Thou art working within us, that the hidden man of the heart may be visible in our daily life." In the spirit of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RATIFICATION OF SEVENTEENTH AMENDMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read:

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Raleigh, January 25, 1913.

SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith a certified copy of the act of the North Carolina General Assembly ratifying the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Respectfully,

HOURS OF DAILY SERVICE OF LABORERS AND MECHANICS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor bill, H. R. 28180.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for five minutes to respond to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent that he may address the House for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, when the House adjourned yesterday, it adjourned with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE] on the floor making a violent attack upon his colleague from Philadelphia, and in the course of his remarks he referred to the various high crimes and misdemeanors that had been committed by his colleague against the newspapers of Philadelphia. The "gentleman from Pennsylvania" now addressing the House has on several occasions undertaken to say that he has no very great concern about the headlines in the Philadelphia newspapers, nor has he any very great concern about the number of articles his colleague sends from here concerning what he has done. But the "gentleman from Pennsylvania" [Mr. MOORE] is vastly interested in doing something for the State and city which he in part represents, as he is intensely interested in getting something done for the Delaware River, which will put the city of Philadelphia on a par with other great cities on the Atlantic seaboard.

In this connection he desires to say to his colleague on the other side of the House that he has no dispute with him as to the part he has played in waterways matters in the two years he has been in Congress, but rather congratulates him that on account of his intimate association with the Rockefellers and Morgans of rivers and harbors he has done his best, and I trust that he will exercise the wonderful influence he now possesses in order to accomplish greater things for his city and the river Delaware; and in that I will join with him.

But, as the facts develop, it does seem that in the secret conclaves of the river and harbor Morgans and Rockefellers with whom he associates, who tell him they will treat him fairly if he will give them what they want, he yields too readily to the blandishments which they exercise over him. It is like the story of the Merritt Bros., who are supposed to have yielded up the Mesaba Range.

In these great councils I can see my colleague cheerfully give the Mississippi Valley $9,185,000 to get a start upon the construction of levees. I can see him cheerfully voting $5,500,000 into the Ohio River and $2,000,000 and upward into the Missouri River for a $20,000,000 project, and I can hear him say to the gentleman from Texas, "For your great streams cheerfully do I give you $3,000,000."

And for these reasons it seems to me that when I offer a very simple amendment to remove shoals from behind the breakwater in Delaware Bay the gentleman ought to forget the influence of the Morgans and Rockefellers of his committee and not vote "no" to that proposition, as he did on Saturday. When I offer an innocent amendment to this bill, proposing that there shall be a survey for Frankford Creek, which is in the gentleman's district, the gentleman ought not to accept the nods of his powerful associates and vote against the interests of the city which he was sent here to promote. And when I gave him the opportunity to vote for a survey of the Schuylkill River—a survey involving no request for an appropriation or any outlay of money—the gentleman ought not to chide me, and again listen to the Rockefellers and Morgans with whom he associates, and vote "no" to a provision for the survey.

And when we come up to that more important project in which we are all interested—the Delaware River—I would wish to relieve him from being buncoed by his powerful friends the Rockefellers and Morgans of the committee, for it appears that instead of getting $2,000,000, as he believed he got, he really got only about $1,000,000 for that project.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I say to him he should not have voted against the Delaware River amendment.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not yield. This course of conduct on the part of my colleague reminds me of a story that might have been told by the amiable gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. The old negro mammy is standing in the doorway of her hut, calling out to Jim, her little boy, "Come in, Jim; come in, Jim; wha' for you standin' out thar wif dat white trash, lettin' 'em eat all the 'lasses off yah bread and then call you 'nigger eat dirt wif a rusty spoon'? Come in hyar. I break yo' back wif a board." [Laughter.]

In this I can not appeal to my colleagues from the South and West perhaps, but I ask my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE] to use that powerful influence he has with these strong and influential men upon the committee to get a little more justice accorded to the great river Delaware. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute more.

Mr. EDWARDS. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will be allowed to continue.

Mr. EDWARDS. I object. We have heard enough reflections on honest men by the only honest man in the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS] is like the suffragettes, objecting to everything. [Laughter.]

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, I am not unprepared to make answer to my distinguished colleague from Philadelphia [Mr. MOORE]. In fact, I have at my fingers' ends facts and figures and newspaper articles in abundance to make a statement which if it applied with equal force to any other gentleman in this House would not tend to increase his self-esteem. But in view of the state of the public business here, in view of the delay that has been occasioned by the petty trifling of the last few days, I feel that I can perform a much higher duty to the country by bearing patiently these childish attacks rather than by using the time of the House in making the reply which ordinarily the circumstances would warrant.

And I remember, too, that I—and, I presume, my friend, Mr. MOORE—kneel down every night and morning and say, "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us." I learned that prayer at the knees of my angel mother over 40 years ago, and I hope to kneel down to-night and repeat it with an humble and a contrite heart. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Monongahela River, Pa., by the reconstruction of Lock and Dam No. 6, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1217, Sixty-second Congress, third session, $178,200.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee if the Monongahela River is not bisected by the city of Pittsburgh—that is, the city of Pittsburgh stands on both sides of this river?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I believe it does. I am not quite as familiar with the city of Pittsburgh as I ought to be, but I fancy it does. If the gentleman says so, I will agree to it.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, did the gentleman ask the question if the river was bisected?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I intended to say the city was bisected by the river, but I accept the correction of the schoolmaster. [Laughter.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GOLDFOGLE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles, asks a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. BURNHAM, and Mr. GORE as the conferees on the part of the Senate:

S. 8035. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 7160. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 8034. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 18841. An act incorporating the National Institute of Arts and Letters; and

H. R. 24194. An act to create a new division of the western judicial district of Texas and to provide for terms of court at Pecos, Tex., and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the President pro tempore had appointed Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas and Mr. BURNHAM members of the joint committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Department of the Interior.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4356. An act incorporating the American Academy of Arts and Letters.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions (S. Res. 443):

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. SYLVESTER C. SMITH, late a Representative from the State of California.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Representative SYLVESTER C. SMITH the Senate do now adjourn.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Wilmington, Del.: For restoration and maintenance, $30,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee if the city of Wilmington does not extend on both sides of this river? An appropriation was refused for Frankford Creek because the city extended on both sides.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was voted down.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It was voted down, but not, I think, on that ground. A better reason perhaps was that there was no project for the improvement. As I stated to the gentleman the other day, if there was a project recommended by the engineers for that it would not be rejected, I fancy, solely because it was inside of the corporate limits of the city. Mr. Chairman, as I stated the other day, we do not desire to establish, nor have we established, any hard-and-fast rule for our Government in the matter of doing work in inner harbors. Each tub, so to speak, must stand on its own bottom. Whenever we reach a proposition of that kind we will give it careful consideration, considering the benefits that will likely accrue to commerce and the cost involved.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman tell us how we are going to follow the rule which the gentleman now enunciates if, in one instance, like Frankford Creek, the city extends on both sides, and an appropriation and a survey are refused, and in the case of this river or creek, where the city extends on both sides, a survey is granted and a $20,000 appropriation is allowed?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I should like to say to the gentleman right here that when I voted against the amendment which the gentleman offered for a survey I based my action largely upon the fact, as I have understood, that there was an agreement some years ago—whether it was a wise or unwise agreement I am not here to say——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was with regard to the Schuylkill, not with regard to Frankford Creek.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Let me finish what I was saying—that there was an agreement by which the city of Philadelphia was to take care of the navigable waters inside the city while the Government improved the river from the ocean up to the city. I would like before authorizing a survey to investigate a little further and, among other things, ascertain whether there was actually such an arrangement and whether it is wise to continue it. At all events, I think the committee would like and that this House would desire more information before acting; but whenever a project is recommended by the engineers, it will no doubt be carefully considered by the Rivers and Harbors Committee. The fact that the work to be done is inside the corporate limits of the city should not be the determining factor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the committee will not object to further consideration both of Frankford Creek and Schuylkill River?

Mr. SPARKMAN. If it comes up hereafter in the proper way. We could not accept any amendment to the bill now.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, I hope the impression will not go out that we object to these things. We are simply waiting for the approval of the engineers.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving inland waterway between Rehoboth Bay and Delaware Bay, Del.: Continuing improvement in accordance with the reports submitted in House Document No. 823, Sixtieth Congress, first session, and in Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 51, Sixty-first Congress, third session, $41,725.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

"Connecting Chesapeake Bay and Delaware River: The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to enter into negotiations for the purchase of the existing Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, in accordance with recommendations contained in House Document No. 391, Sixty-second Congress, second session, and Senate Document No. 215, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, and to agree to purchase the same subject to appropriation by Congress; or, in event of failure to agree upon terms of purchase, to institute condemnation proceedings therefor."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in 1909—and I say this for the benefit of our farmer friends in this House—it cost $1.30 to transport a ton of 2,240 pounds of fertilizer from Philadelphia to North Carolina by water inland, through such dilapidated canals and inland waterways as we now have; when to send a short-weight ton of 2,000 pounds of fertilizer the same distance by rail it cost $4.80 a ton. That is a very considerable difference to the consumer, who, in this instance, is the farmer. It is one of the many illustrations that I could bring to bear if I had time. It shows the importance in a commercial sense of opening up the waterways along the Atlantic seaboard.

In 1909 I wrote the Secretary of the Navy, knowing that some torpedo boats of the Government were to be sent from Philadelphia Navy Yard to Charleston, and requested him to try the experiment of sending the boats through the inland waterways. He wrote that it was impossible to do so because of the insufficient depth of the waterways, much as he would like to use them. He sent the vessels outside. I watched the outcome. They were met by a storm off Cape Hatteras and were driven in. Some of the men were badly injured, the vessels were battered, and the Government was put to great expense.

And yet an inside waterway would have given complete and safe facilities for the transportation of these vessels.

Two years ago four barges left the city of Philadelphia carrying coal to Boston. They were beaten ashore off Cape Cod and 17 of the constituents of the gentleman from Philadelphia and mine were drowned. These vessels should never have gone to sea; they should have gone inside, where the Almighty provided waterways for them to use, if man and the Government would simply improve these waterways and give them a safe and protected course.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk speaks for at least 1,000 representatives of the Atlantic seaboard gathered in convention at New London last September. They asked Congress to do something for the relief of the Atlantic coast. Gentlemen can spend money in the interior, but they seem to feel that there is no need along the Atlantic coast, despite the frightful storms that we endure every winter season.

Two times have favorable reports by the engineers been made upon this particular Chesapeake and Delaware project. To be sure, I have no time to argue the whole question, but the Government engineers have favorably reported twice. The matter has been brought before the River and Harbor Committee, and yet no favorable action has been had. The Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, concerning which the amendment refers, is a link 13 miles long between the Delaware River and the Chesapeake Bay. It is capable of doing the business in an environment that creates 50,000,000 tons a year. The old canal does less now than 1,000,000 tons because it is privately owned and so restricted in regard to rates that the railroads have almost complete control of the territory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended five minutes longer.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I object; let the gentleman extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Very well, Mr. Chairman, I accept that. I make the point that no quorum is present.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will withdraw his objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want him to withdraw it. He has been facetious all through the bill. He gets his provisions in, but objects to others.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-five Members present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Aiken, S. C.	Berger	Cravens	Dixon, Ind.
Ames	Bradley	Curry	Dodds
Andrus	Burke, Pa.	Danforth	Doremus
Ansberry	Burke, S. Dak.	Davidson	Dwight

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MOON of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 28180, the river and harbor appropriation bill, had found itself without a quorum; that he had directed the roll to be called; that 248 Members had responded to their names, a quorum, and he reported to the House the names of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes upon the amendment now before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes on the pending amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, before I use these five minutes, I want to make an apology to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS]. A little while ago in the heat of discussion, when he objected to my having time, I believe I referred to him as a suffragette. In order that there may be no misunderstanding of this term, I desire to explain that I used that expression because the gentleman, in his anxiety to pass the bill, is always calling for votes.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment before the House contemplates the opening up of the most feasible and probably the least expensive link in what is known as the Atlantic coastal waterway. It is difficult to convince gentlemen who come from the interior as to the necessity for this project or to make them understand the situation along the Atlantic seaboard. Some of the brightest minds in this House have the notion that it is a mere biscuit throw from the solid land across some of these Atlantic coastal waterways into the ocean. That is where they show their ignorance of the real facts. These inland waterways in some instances are 100 miles from the shore, and they provide to-day for a barge traffic, and what is left of the sailing craft, a business that is enormous, and that if driven into the ocean would mean increased prices to the consumers in rates and insurance and the risk and danger of loss both to life and property. I have statistics here which have been gathered by a very able board of statisticians, headed by Prof. Emory R. Johnson, who has acquired some fame in connection with the Panama Canal, which show that during the decade from 1900 to 1909 there were over 5,700 disasters to shipping on the Atlantic seaboard. This is within the range of this proposed Atlantic coastal waterway. Not all of the losses were reported during those 10 years, but these accidents are known to have destroyed $40,500,000 worth of vessels and cargo and to have caused the loss of over 2,200 lives.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has stated that a number of these commercial centers that are to be reached by this intercoastal waterway are as much as 100 miles from the sea.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Some of them.

Mr. HELM. What are those commercial centers? Will the gentleman please name them?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Down in North Carolina there are some.

Mr. HELM. What are they?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was specializing when I said 100 miles. Say 50 miles. There are some in the State of New Jersey. We will put it between 50 and 100 miles.

Mr. HELM. What are the names of the places?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In North Carolina alone there are inside waterways that total 2,500 miles.

Mr. HELM. If these places are so numerous, why can not the gentleman name some of them?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will pardon me, but if I could get the time I would be very glad to answer his question. This is a very important matter, and I desire to get through.

Mr. HELM. I am satisfied that it is an important matter, and that is why I am trying to get this information.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman ask for more time for me if I answer his question?

Mr. HELM. Oh, yes; I will ask for the time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Very well; proceed. I will leave it to the honor of the gentleman to help me out.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman is leaving it to a very safe proposition. The gentleman has not yet given the names of those commercial centers that he says can be reached by this intercoastal waterway.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will tell the gentleman just what the whole project is.

Mr. HELM. No; I want to know the names of these commercial centers that the gentleman says are from 50 to 100 miles away from the coast.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Wilmington, Del.; Trenton, N. J.; Wilmington, Newbern, and Edenton, N. C. I can give the gentleman many of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. Are there any others?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; plenty of them, all down the line—Philadelphia, Jacksonville, Savannah.

Mr. HELM. How many of them that the gentleman has named can be reached now by waterway?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. All of them can be reached from the outside—from the ocean—by vessels of certain draft.

Mr. HELM. How deep is the channel by which they may be reached?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The channels vary in depth. I have tried to tell the House that one channel is 40 feet deep, and that monopolizes the major portion of the business. You could not get up to Trenton if——

Mr. HELM. But the depth of this channel, in connection with the intercoastal waterway to which the gentleman has referred——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman does not seem to understand what I am trying to make him understand, that there are 1,800 miles of territory traversed by these streams upon which trade, business, and commerce will engage. Now, does not the gentleman want some line of communication between these cities inland, and will he listen to the proposition we are considering? It is substantially 90 miles, as a bird flies, from the city of Philadelphia to Baltimore; that means between the North and South. The project I am bringing before the committee now is the Chesapeake & Delaware project; it is 90 miles, as a bird flies, from Philadelphia to Baltimore. Of course, you can reach either city through the port from the ocean; but if you want to go by water inside—and there is no available inside route such as I am suggesting, except a 9-foot canal—you have to sail out of the port of Philadelphia, down the Delaware River and bay, out into the ocean, down by Maryland and Virginia, around Cape Charles, up the Chesapeake Bay, up the Patapsco River to Baltimore, a distance of 325 miles, subject to all the expense and inconvenience of insurance and ocean-going risk, while with a barge route you can go the 90 miles through a canal only 13 miles long in as much safety as by a standardized railroad line. That is the point.

Mr. HELM. Can not an ocean-going vessel touch at every one of the commercial centers the gentleman has enumerated?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; if the channels are deep enough. But I want to say to the gentleman that that is the very point I am bringing to the attention of the committee. If you want to centralize all the business of the country in this territory of 1,800 miles from Maine to Key West in the hands of ocean-going steamers, then you vote that way. I want to open up means of communication inland, so that business can be done without it having to go exclusively to ocean carrying vessels and railway lines.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this proposition has been approved by the commission known as the Angus Commission, consisting of engineers and civilians, appointed by the President by direction of Congress. It has been approved by the United States engineers and by the Board of Review. It has been before the Rivers and Harbors Committee time after time. There seems to be no objection to it except as to cost. The engineers have estimated that this entire project could be completed to 25 feet for $12,000,000; that it would save life and property and that it would give opportunity to take the iron hand of existing monopolistic companies off the one link of communication that is now provided between the North and the South. This matter has been approved by the representatives of States all along the line of the Atlantic coast. Men like the governor of Massachusetts, Mr. Foss, have heartily and openly approved it and insisted that it should be done for the relief of New England. Men like Gov. Mann, of Virginia, have openly and eloquently approved it and insisted that the time has come for Congress to act, and that if Congress does not act it is time for the people to get behind their Congressmen and make them act. Everything that can be said has been said in support of this project, but Congress halts, and while Congress halts, taking the money and giving it to western projects, about which I do not complain, except that it holds us back, the owners of this old canal say to those who do business through it, "The rates you pay here must equal those paid to the railroads," and thus make Congress play into the hands of the existing transportation companies. The passage of this amendment now will not take a single dollar from the Government, but it authorizes the United States engineers to negotiate for the property and to take it if they find it can be had within the cost recommended. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that he may address the committee for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I want briefly to reply, in the five minutes which I have asked, to the gentlemen who have spoken on this bill during the last three days. We made no objection to the extension of time requested by these gentlemen, although for nearly a week the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has been held up to the country as a band of conspirators, who are inspired by no better purpose than the desire to steal the money out of the Treasury of the United States, that it might be spent in our localities, as one gentleman expressed it, for the benefit of the barkeepers and the grocerymen and the local contractors.

I do not intend to reply in kind to such charges. This House knows, Mr. Chairman, the character of the men who are on the Rivers and Harbors Committee; this House knows the character of the men who have made these baseless, reckless charges; and I am willing to submit to the judgment the House has rendered so far and will render further between us. [Applause.]

I will state this matter briefly, for the benefit of these gentlemen, because they are not handicapped with any information on the subject, if they really want light, although the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY], when a member of the committee [Mr. EDWARDS] asked him the other day upon which item he wished information, announced cavalierly, "I wish no information on any item. The whole bill is rotten."

Now, just let me state what the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have done and how we proceed. Before any project is considered by the committee a survey is ordered by the Engineer Corps of the Army, and there is upon this earth no more patriotic corps of public officials than the Engineer Corps of the United States Army. [Applause.] There have been cited two instances to prove how corrupt our Engineer Corps is—one in the Philippines, which was not under an engineer of the Army, and one in Arizona, which was not under an engineer of the Army—but we were told "All engineers look alike to me."

Mr. Chairman, I believe if you will strike from the history of this country the record of the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, you will tear from our history some of its brightest pages. There is no higher profession than that of the engineer, not even that of a pork-barrel politician or a sand-dune statesman. George Washington was an engineer and engaged as such in the improvement of the rivers of this country. Robert E. Lee was an engineer of the Army, and Col. Goethals is an engineer of the Army. [Applause.] I call attention of the House to those names as an answer to the reckless charge that these engineers favor river and harbor improvements in order that they may hold their jobs. Who is it so ignorant that he believes the engineers of the Army are dependent for their jobs on continuing river and harbor improvements? They are graduates of West Point. They are in the Army, and hold their places for life, but instead of letting them remain idle with their commands we wisely put them in times of peace at work on those public works which will promote the commercial interests of the country and its development. [Applause.]

When these engineers report on a project—and I hope the gentlemen will listen to me—they state what the project is, how much it will take to complete it, and what the appropriation should be annually. They state what the commerce is, they state the value of it, they state the items which compose the commerce, and upon that Congress acts. But if it is a considerable sum which is involved, representatives from the commercial organizations or communities interested come before the committee and we have public hearings. All of those are published. At the beginning of this session three volumes of reports were placed to the credit of every Member of this House, so that he might examine, if he chose, any project mentioned in the bill, and get all the information desirable.

If he were not satisfied with that, he could come to the committee room and ask for the public hearing, where the merchants, the manufacturers, aye, and the farmers, have appeared before us, begging and insisting that these highways of commerce be improved for the benefit of all the people. We came to Washington in November, before the convening of this Congress. For two long months we worked upon this bill—all day, every day—in an earnest and honest effort to serve our country. There were before us projects approved by the engineers calling for appropriations amounting to $82,000,000. By dint of hard labor we were able at last to sift this down to less than $41,000,000. When that was done we reported the bill to the House. What a piece of legislative stupidity it would be, what a piece of inexcusable extravagance it would be, to copy those reports and those hearings, which have already been printed at public expense, once more in a report from the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I will not, with all due respect to the gentleman. I think he has had his day in court; in fact, he has had three days in court. [Applause.]

There is not a bill that is reported to this House where every item is subjected to more relentless scrutiny than the river and harbor bill. And when gentlemen denounce this committee as a band of pirates they ought to specify. They ought not to do like the Wolfville preacher out in the far and arid West, who, we are told by Mr. Lewis, "argued and argued, but could not pint out"; and that is exactly what these gentlemen have done.

Why, my distinguished friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who has spoken more on this bill than any member of the committee, has never moved to strike a paragraph from it, and has voted to add every item that has been offered as an amendment to it.

Mr. MONDELL. Now will the gentleman yield, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I will yield for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. I simply want to correct the gentleman. I did move to strike out several paragraphs of the bill.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman moved to strike out the last word and sometimes the last two words. But he talked in generalities. He never confined himself to any project, and when the gentleman mentioned here, without giving the name, the Trinity River, the gentleman assumed he meant the upper Missouri!——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi (continuing). And he at once proceeded to denounce the upper Missouri, but he made no motion to strike it out.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman misunderstands. I did refer particularly to a number of items in the bill and I did move to strike out the paragraph, but I lost because your combination was too strong.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Exactly. We are charged with combinations here; we are charged with conspiring to steal the public funds. If that be true, we are unworthy of a seat in this House, and the gentleman who makes the charge and fails to submit the proof is unworthy the respect of any man in this House. [Applause.]

Now, several projects have been mentioned, among them being the Trinity River. The distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] answered the criticisms made against that so thoroughly and conclusively that nobody has mentioned it since.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SCULLY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi be allowed to proceed for 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate has been exhausted on this paragraph and amendments thereto, and only by unanimous consent can the gentleman proceed.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] reserves the right to object.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I want to reserve the right to object until I can have this understanding, that I am to have five minutes later in which to answer the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. That is for the committee to decide later on. Is there objection?

Mr. CALLAWAY. If the gentleman will agree, I shall not object.

Mr. CANDLER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that my colleague from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] be allowed to proceed for 10 minutes, and that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] have 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The request now is that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes, and then that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] proceed for 5 minutes. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, after these general remarks I would like to address myself to the proposition espoused by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. I am not one of those who believe that this is a ridiculous scheme which the gentleman is advocating. I think there is great merit in this intercoastal canal proposition. [Applause.] But the committee proceeds under limitations that are necessary. We have not discriminated against that project. We have taken on one link of it. We can not take on the whole project at once. In the bill a year ago we adopted one link. We are now appropriating for that. The link which the gentleman proposes, as I recall, would cost $12,000,000. We did not feel that in this bill we were able to take that over. We had to choose between links, and I call the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] to this statement, because he has devoted his opposition principally, as I understood it, to the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal. There is now carried on a privately owned canal between Norfolk and Beaufort 700,000 tons annually of American commerce which pays toll; and, as I stated the other day, it would require two freight trains a day, each train carrying 30 cars of 60,000 pounds capacity, all fully loaded, every day in the year to carry 700,000 tons. That commerce is being carried on a 6-foot channel. Seagoing craft can not use it. The ocean has its burying places as well as the land, and Hatteras is one of those somber spots. There have gone down on the Diamond Shoals, off Hatteras, millions on top of millions of American property, wrecked, and there have gone down hundreds on top of hundreds of American lives, sacrificed to the angry storms that play about Cape Hatteras.

This proposition enables little ships to avoid that dangerous coast; not the great Morgan steamers that ply from New York to Galveston, not the great steamships that are owned by this Shipping Trust that we hear so severely denounced, because they are large ocean-going vessels, and they are not disturbed by the storms off Hatteras; but the little independent lines—the little boats that do not draw so much water, that can not venture out to sea as the big ones do—they are the ones that will use this short passage in behind Hatteras, and thus save to our people millions of money and hundreds of lives every year when this canal is deepened to 12 feet. [Applause.] That being true, when we came to select we chose that particular project as the link that in our opinion was most necessary in this great intercoastal canal proposition running from Boston to the Rio Grande. A part of it has been constructed already by private enterprise. Would men invest their money in projects of this sort simply to furnish funds for barkeepers and grocery men? They have been built because the commerce of the country demanded it, and they are calling upon Congress now to take it over and so deepen it that the ships that now go down in wrecks may use it in safe transport for American commerce.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] in every speech has charged that we are neglecting the Atlantic seacoast. Is he the only representative from the seaboard? He forgets the fact that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE] is a member of this committee; and there is not a more high-purposed or patriotic Representative in this House. [Applause.]

When he goes out of this House on the 4th of March, it is the judgment of every man here who knows him that this country will lose the services of one of its best and most honorable and patriotic public servants. [Applause.] He is on the Atlantic coast, and is a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. Mr. SCULLY, of New Jersey, Mr. DONOHOE, of Pennsylvania, Mr. SMALL, of North Carolina, Mr. ELLERBE, of South Carolina, and Mr. EDWARDS, of Georgia, are all on this committee, and they represent the Atlantic seacoast. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is the only one complaining. He is the representative at large from the Atlantic seacoast.

To paraphrase a familiar rhyme:

> For he is the cook of the Nancy brig
> And the mate and the captain, too;
> And the bos'un tight and the midshipmite,
> In fact, he is the whole damn crew.

[Laughter.]

The Mississippi River has been criticized. I challenge any man who speaks on that subject to quote the platform of his party. I do not care whether he be Democrat, Republican, or Progressive. I challenge any man when he assails this committee for providing for the Mississippi River to incorporate in his remarks the platform of his party. And if a Democrat criticize it, I challenge him to quote what a very distinguished gentleman in this country has said on the subject, one whose democracy nobody on this side of the House will challenge, publicly at least.

Mr. MANN. At this time.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Gov. Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I think that is sufficient to say, so far as the Mississippi River is concerned. If you are not going to provide for it, if the Democrats are not going to provide for it, let us serve notice now, before the 4th of March comes, that when we made that promise to the people in our platform, and when our candidate made it in his letter of acceptance, we were simply trying to bunco the people. I do not believe we were. I do not believe he was. Among the projects that have been criticized are the rivers in the State of Texas. Texas Representatives in this House have come before our committee, Mr. HENRY, Mr. HARDY, Mr. MOORE, Mr. GARNER, Mr. BEALL, Mr. BURLESON, and Mr. SHEPPARD. They have advocated these projects. The distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] is a member of our committee. I decline to believe that all these gentlemen from Texas have entered into an unholy conspiracy to plunder the Federal Treasury in order to take money back home, not for the public good but to squander it among the barkeepers, grocerymen, and contractors of their neighborhood. [Applause.] I believe they are honorable men, and no honorable man will indulge in the character of legislation that has been charged against the Rivers and Harbors Committee.

There are items in this bill, as there are items in every other bill that has ever been reported, that I did not favor; not because I thought they were unworthy, but because I thought there were others more worthy. I have sat in that committee when 40,000 of my constituents were homeless and shelterless because of the floods of the great river, when an appropriation for the Mississippi levees was the very breath to my nostrils.

I have sat in that committee when I was praying for liberal appropriations, and yet at the same time I have fought propositions in which other members of the committee were vitally interested. Never yet have I and I believe no member of that committee has ever yet traded off his vote, directly or indirectly, on one proposition to secure votes for a proposition of his own. [Applause.]

It is said that we are wasting the public funds on worthless, insignificent creeks. The trouble is not with the creeks, not with the appropriation bill; the trouble is that the gentlemen know nothing of the geography of their country. I stated a few days ago, and I state it now, that no money ever brought back better returns than the money we appropriate for the improvement of the creeks which are carried in this bill. The appropriations for all these creeks combined is about $130,000, whereas the American commerce annually borne upon them in the busy industrial life of this country amounts to the tremendous sum of $250,000,000. Seven million tons of American commerce are floated every year on these much-criticized creeks—a tonnage more than one-half as much as that carried on the Ohio river, a tonnage certainly half as much as the American tonnage which will pass through the Panama Canal for a number of years after its completion. We are not criticized for appropriating more than $60,000,000 for the Ohio. No man who has respect for his own opinion will do that. We are not criticized for spending nearly $400,000,000 for the Panama Canal, but gentlemen become excited and in their ignorance declaim against this bill because it carries $130,000 for the creeks of this country, which float, as I said, $250,000,000 worth of the people's products every year. The inland commerce of the United States exceeds in value the international commerce of all the nations of the world combined. When enterprising gentlemen go upon the high seas and undertake to destroy this international commerce, they are held guilty of piracy, and if there are pirates in this House that crime must be laid at the door of those gentlemen who are seeking here to-day to paralyze and destroy the inland commerce of the United States which is borne upon our navigable streams. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not care anything about all this flattery of the engineers of the War Department. That is no argument in favor of this proposition which we are attacking. I assume that the engineers of the War Department are men like the people in other walks of life; that they are no better and no worse than people in every other walk of life. I assume that the engineers of the War Department are human and influenced by their interests and by their future, just as men in every walk of life are influenced, just as the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors are mortal, human, and influenced by their interests.

The question is not whether George Washington was an engineer or Robert E. Lee was an engineer, or whether Woodrow Wilson favors some project for the Mississippi River. This flattery and the mentioning of names is begging the issue, dodging the question, muddying the water to cut out the light. The question is whether or not this item, this initial step in an intercoastal waterway that is proposed to run from Boston, Mass., to the Rio Grande along the coast, touching the places only that already have water, should be put in this bill.

They provide $800,000 as an initial step, to be expended on a segment of that project that reaches from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort, N. C., not that it will complete that segment of the project, but that it will be a starter on that project; that it will unite two private canals that will be a part of the project; that when they have got that which the gentleman from Mississippi says is the best segment of the route according to the engineers' report, which will cost $5,400,000 and is 100 miles in length, they will argue that we want to put in the next best segment, and this report to which they cited me lays out the segments and names the best of them as being from Norfolk to Beaufort Inlet, N. C. Then they will move along, and, being benefited by this project, they will move from one segment to the other, bringing the last one before the House as the only plausible way they can push it.

I did say that the saloonkeepers along the route would be interested in it; the grocerymen and the dry-goods merchants will be interested; the railroads will be interested in it; the electric-light men would be interested in it; the street car men, where the money will be expended, will be interested in it; and the contractors will be interested in it; and the man from Mississippi knows that is God Almighty's truth. Every man in the House knows it is the truth.

And yet they get up here and talk about Robert E. Lee and George Washington and some honorable gentlemen on the committee and try to dodge the question. I asked the gentlemen on the committee to give me some information in reference to this item, and they cited me to 4,000 pages of engineers' report, and said they hoped I was patriotic and energetic enough to read through that lot of slush.

But the bill fortunately cited this document, containing 278 pages, and I got hold of that, put in Saturday night and Sunday and Sunday night looking it through, and yesterday I came in here and said, "Here is your report; I have read it through," and on that report of the engineers I pronounce it a damnable scheme to rob the Federal Treasury and the people of this country, and that the people would, if they understood the scheme, kick the last man out of the House who dares to stand for it. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes, for the purpose of discussing the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be favorably considered by the House. As has been stated, it has some merit and is one of the links in what will be the intercoastal waterway, of which we have heard so much, if it should ever be completed. Although the original plan as carried by the survey ordered by Congress covered the stretch between Boston and Beaufort Inlet, N. C., only two links have been recommended by the engineers. These are the ones from Norfolk to Beaufort and the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal. The latter is covered by this amendment. The former was adopted in the act of 1912. We adopted that not only on account of the fact that it was a worthy project but from the fact that it would cost less than the one we have before us now.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] says that this is an entering wedge to the adoption of the whole system. I can not say whether it is an entering wedge or not. That would depend upon what view Congress may later take of the matter.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have only five minutes, but go ahead.

Mr. CALLAWAY. When I asked the gentleman about this project did he not cite me to this House Document 391, the intercoastal waterway?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I expect I did. If I did not, I should have done so.

Mr. CALLAWAY. And in that report is not this laid out as one of the segments of the intercoastal proposition, and the engineers' report favorable on this because it is a part of the intercoastal proposition?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would not say that it goes that far. The engineers base their recommendation upon their view as to the advisability of doing that particular work, because in their judgment it will benefit a large commerce, both local and general. In other words, that the benefits to result will justify the expenditure.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman if the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], the other day, advocating this proposition before the House, on page 1937 of the RECORD, did not say that the present tolls, which were absolutely unbearable, upon this canal amount now only to $103,000? That is in this project now. Those tolls will be relieved, provided we expend $5,400,000.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the canal is not all of the project. It is only a small part of that project, being only about 14 miles in length, while the entire distance covered by the project is 182 miles, and if the expenditure of that $5,000,000 will relieve the people from the payment of those burdensome tolls, I submit to this House if it is not a judicious expenditure. [Applause.] The gentleman does not seem to know anything or care anything about the people of that section, about the commercial advantages of the project; and let me say to him that if he will read those reports—I commend them to him—not only the one to which he refers, but the 4,000 pages, if there are so many, to which he has alluded so often. If he will spend, not his Sundays—I would not advise him to do that—but his weekdays and only a part of his nights in reading these reports he will acquire a better idea of the advantages accruing and that will accrue to the country from the completion of these great works than he seems to have at the present time. [Applause.]

I want to say further, that in my judgment the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is a proposition well worthy of consideration, one on which we can profitably spend a few moments in discussion here. But, while it has merit, I do not believe we should adopt it now. First, however, let me say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] that the work we have been doing, the work that this Government has done during the 90 years we have been carrying on river and harbor work, has been of great benefit to the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I want to say to him that the navigable waterways of this country, for the improvement of which and the maintenance of which the sums recommended in this bill are to be appropriated, accommodate a commerce of 275,000,000 tons every year, to say nothing of duplications and triplications of that commerce. Counting all these, as they ought to be considered, as it emphasizes the importance of the work, the aggregate reaches five or six hundred millions of tons each year. He says he can find nothing to show what a ton of commerce costs the Government. I have seen it estimated somewhere that these expenditures are saving the people of this country at least $1 per ton for each ton of freight carried by water.

If that be true, or if even the half of it is true, then we can well afford the $700,000,000 that we have already expended upon the navigable waterways of the country, and we can well spare the $40,000,000 that this bill carries. [Applause.]

Now, a word or two more in regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. While the project covered by it has more or less merit, I do not believe it should go into this bill. It may be that in the next bill, or in the next, it can be taken up and more favorable consideration given it, but we can not decide now. It may be that it would be better to wait until we have more nearly completed the canal and the waterway from Norfolk to Beaufort Inlet, N. C., before beginning the other project. When that is completed, or at least a little later, we can see what the results are likely to be, we can better judge as to the advisability of taking on the larger project. This canal already has 10 feet of water and is accumulating quite a commerce. It is true it is a toll canal, and the people ought perhaps to be relieved from the burden of these tolls. But we can not do everything at once. We can not care for all these projects now. We must stop somewhere, and so far as this part of the intercoastal system is concerned, we have drawn the line there at this time—whether wisely or unwisely, it is for this House to say.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, is it not a fact that last year this committee appropriated $500,000 for this same project, which has never been expended on it, and if this $800,000 item is cut out now, with the $500,000 item, there will be a saving of $1,300,000?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Not for this, but the other project. I do not know whether it would be saved.

Mr. CALLAWAY. It would not come out of the Treasury.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If you cut out the appropriation you will stop the work, and if you cut out the thirty-eight millions of dollars that the gentleman's amendment proposed yesterday to strike out, you will stop all of these great works and the advantages we expect that the people will derive from them.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. SPARKMAN. There is no greater work than that we are now doing, and if the gentleman were dependent upon the votes of a majority of the American people for a seat here he would never come to Congress by standing before this House and opposing these great works. [Applause.]

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is it not a fact that in the attitude of the gentleman before this House the gentleman does not attempt to defend this particular project as an initial step of this great intercoastal scheme?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, no; it is not a fact. On the contrary, I am defending it——

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman does not stand sponsor for it, does he, notwithstanding your bill here cites this House Document No. 391, Sixty-second Congress, second session, for reasons why this project should be entered into?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Why, most assuredly. If I did not stand sponsor for it here I would not have brought in the report. [Applause.]

Mr. CALLAWAY. Did not the gentleman say to the committee—you would not deny it was an entering wedge, but you would not say that it was. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Those in favor of the amendment will say "aye," those opposed "no." The "noes" have it and the amendment is rejected, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Division, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chairman, I asked for a division in time.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, the gentleman shall have the vote.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the gentleman from Wyoming was on his feet addressing the Chair——

Mr. LANGLEY. He undoubtedly was.

Mr. MANN (continuing). And was entitled to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate was exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. MANN. That depends upon whether an amendment should be offered to it or not. Debate had not been exhausted by order of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule debate is exhausted.

Mr. MANN. Debate is exhausted unless the gentleman desired to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the gentleman from Wyoming there is another item in this bill to which we are going to return, and he may get time on that item.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming offer an amendment or is his request for unanimous consent?

Mr. MONDELL. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Have we passed by the amendment offered by myself in relation to the Chespeake & Delaware Canal? In the confusion it appeared that the Chair stated that that amendment was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. On the amendment that the gentleman from Pennsylvania offered a short while ago, on which there was debate, the Chair announced that that amendment was lost. By unanimous consent that order will be vacated, of course, and the gentleman from Wyoming be allowed to offer his amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is an amendment to my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is all right.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have aroused the ire of some gentlemen on the committee because I have criticized certain items in this bill. I have not criticized the bill as a whole. I am in favor of river and harbor improvements and river and harbor bills. Since I have been a Member of this House we have appropriated over $400,000,000 for those purposes, and I have supported all of the bills, reserving the right to object to and criticize certain items. The only difference between myself and some of the gentlemen who are interested locally in these projects is that I do not consider it necessary in caring for the interest of the commerce of the country and providing proper river and harbor improvements to place upon the bill and carry upon the bill for whatever purpose they may be carried entirely unworthy and indefensible items. I call the attention of the House to the fact that no one has attempted to squarely defend any one of the items that I have criticized or any one of the items which have been criticized by others. They have contented themselves with general abuse of those who see fit to criticize the bill and appeal to us to support the bill because, forsooth, Army engineers have recommended the items in them. If you have read the reports of the Army engineers on any of these projects you will discover that what the Committee on Rivers and Harbors construes as a favorable report in many instances is a statement that in the mind of any other person would damn the project effectually. The committee brings in a bill carrying $40,000,000. It declines, refuses, or at least does not give us the benefit of a single printed line of hearings held in connection with the consideration of these hundreds of items.

It brings in a report of two pages containing no information whatever with regard to any single item in the bill, and except for the fact that it was prodded to it, the committee would not have given a word of explanation of any one of these hundreds of items, and when criticized and prodded all we have had has been abuse, denunciation, coupled with an approval of the engineers as a class.

Now, I favor river and harbor appropriations. I stand ready to vote for them, though no dollar of the hundreds of millions appropriated can ever directly benefit any constitutent of mine. I want to save the river and harbor projects of the country from some of their alleged friends. The time will come, as it came a few years ago, if this committee does not take Congress into its confidence, if it does not give us an opportunity to know why it is doing as it is doing, when the stench of these bills will rise to heaven, until there will not be a man in the length and breadth of the land who will defend them, save and alone those who have projects in their districts, and it is in the hope that we may be saved from that condition, it is in the hope that the great projects to serve the commerce of the country may be carried on that I make my criticism to this bill. I realize that there are many items in this bill that do not appeal to the judgment of all the members of the committee, but nevertheless all committee members will support all of them. There are policies followed that do not have the hearty support of members of the committee, and yet they all feel bound to support the bill as a whole. As we are thus denied the enlightening comments of the men best qualified to criticize, it becomes necessary for some one to call attention to the indefensible character of some of these items in the hope that the bill will not further degenerate into a pork-barrel affair as to many of its items.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May we have the amendment again read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

"Connecting Chesapeake Bay and Delaware River: The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to enter into negotiations for the purchase of the existing Chesapeake & Delaware Canal in accordance with recommendations contained in House Document No. 391, Sixty-second Congress, second session, and Senate Document No. 215, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, and to agree to purchase the same, subject to appropriation by Congress, or, in event of failure to agree upon terms of purchase, to institute condemnation proceedings therefor."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 7, noes 78.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Ohio River: Continuing improvement by the construction of locks and dams with a view to securing a navigable depth of 9 feet, $1,800,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War may enter into a contract or contracts for such materials and work as may be necessary to prosecute the said project, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $3,200,000, exclusive of the amounts herein and heretofore appropriated: Provided further, That the balances of appropriations and authorizations heretofore made for the construction of individual locks and dams are hereby made available for work in connection with the general project adopted by the river and harbor act approved June 25, 1910, for canalization of the Ohio River with a view to securing a navigable depth of 9 feet in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 492, Sixtieth Congress, first session.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors tell us what the total cost of this project is to be?

Mr. SPARKMAN. What is the question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to get the total cost of the Ohio River project as contemplated.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is about $63,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. About $63,000,000 to obtain a depth of 9 feet?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Nine feet.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. For a distance of 900 miles from Pittsburgh to Cairo? That is about the extent of the project?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thank you. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman suspend for a moment?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent to address the committee for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of defending the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I think that is wholly unnecessary. There is probably no committee of this House which does as much able and valuable work in the committee room with as little show on the floor as does the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. But I rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to the fact that from that committee there will be taken at the end of this Congress six of its members. The membership of the committee is great, and all of its members have high standing in the House.

One of the gentlemen now on the committee will leave the House to go to the other end of the Capitol. Five of the members of that committee retire to private life—the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. ELLERBE; the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. LAWRENCE; the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. DAVIDSON; the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. BOEHNE; and my colleague from Illinois, Mr. RODENBERG. All of those gentlemen will leave this House with the regret of the House and every Member in it. [Applause.] They have done great service to their country while here, and I am sure that I voice the unanimous opinion of all men in public life when I wish to them happiness, prosperity, and success, wherever they may be hereafter. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill H. R. 28180, the river and harbor appropriation bill, to the House as amended, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MOON of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration H. R. 28180, the river and harbor appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same to the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The amended bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a motion that the bill be recommitted with instructions.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion and instructions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CALLAWAY moves to recommit the bill with instructions to strike out the paragraph beginning with line 9, on page 14, which reads as follows:

"Improving inland waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C.: Continuing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 391, Sixty-second Congress, second session, $800,000: Provided, That no part of this amount shall be expended until the canal and appurtenant property belonging to the Chesapeake & Albemarle Canal Co. shall have been acquired by the United States by purchase in accordance with the agreement entered into between the Secretary of War and said company under date of February 17, 1912."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

Mr. CALLAWAY rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CALLAWAY. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I want to know how much time I have to discuss this motion.

The SPEAKER. None at all. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking a yea-and-nay vote will rise and stand in their places until they are counted. [After counting.] Forty-five gentleman have arisen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. MACON. The other side, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Forty-five is more than one-fifth.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken about what that rule is.

Mr. MANN. I beg the Chair's pardon; I am not speaking of what the rule is. But in the absence of something to show the Chair that more than a quorum is present, 45 is more than one-fifth of a quorum, and 45 is more than one-fifth of those present.

The SPEAKER. The rule is "one-fifth of those present," but the practice has been ever since the present occupant of the chair has been here—and he does not know for how much longer—that when the roll has been called within a reasonable time before and has revealed a certain number present, it is assumed that that number is still here. If any gentleman is dissatisfied with that showing, he can demand the other side.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

The SPEAKER. Those opposed to taking the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Eighty-seven gentlemen have risen. Forty-five is more than one-fifth, so that the yeas and nays are ordered. When the roll is called those in favor of recommitting this bill will vote "yea" and those opposed will vote "nay." The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I want to ask if the Speaker is not required to state what the instructions are?

The SPEAKER. Oh, no. The Clerk reported the instructions. That is his business. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 83, nays 161, answered "present" 7, not voting 132, as follows:

On this vote:

Mr. HOBSON with Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL.

Until February 1:

Mr. SHACKLEFORD with Mr. LONGWORTH.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. STEVENS, vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. ADAMSON. I voted "no." I wish to withdraw that vote, because I am paired with the gentleman from Minnesota. I wish to be recorded "present."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. SHACKLEFORD, recorded as voting?

The SPEAKER. He is not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I voted "no." I desire to change my vote to "present."

Mr. PALMER. Is the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. HILL, recorded?

The SPEAKER. He is not recorded.

Mr. PALMER. I voted "no" on this proposition. I am paired with the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. HILL. I desire to withdraw my vote and to be recorded "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SPARKMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Thomas F. Haywood, Sixty-second Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 28186—the fortification appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. RUSSELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 28186) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, at this time I do not desire to address the committee, but some days ago I said to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] that I would be glad to see that he had an opportunity during the general debate on this bill to be heard, and I therefore suggest that the Chair recognize the gentleman from Virginia, which will entitle him to an hour.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the newspapers of Sunday of last week report that President Taft, in the address which he delivered in New York City on the Saturday evening previous at the Ohio Society dinner, severely attacked the Philippine independence bill reported from the Committee on Insular Affairs and now upon the calendar of this House. What the President said upon this subject is reported in a dispatch to the Washington Herald, which is in these words:

After an emphatic appeal for an enlargement of the Navy, following an address upon similar lines by Representative HOBSON, the President launched forth into an attack on the Jones bill, now before Congress, providing for the freedom of the Philippines within eight years.

The President termed such a measure "suicidal and highly defective," and said that the United States should treat the Philippines just as Great Britain treats Canada and Australia—as colonies—but should not free them under any circumstances.

WOULD CREATE TROUBLE.

"Were I a political party," said the President, "I could wish the Democrats no worse fortune than the passage of the Jones bill, which I am positive, from my long acquaintance with the Philippine Islands, would result in a mess and a muss which would forever return to plague its makers. The Philippines have cost the United States to date $3,000,000 for civil expenses, and this money was appropriated to save them from starvation. The expense of maintaining troops in the islands is practically nil, and I always will be opposed to any measure looking to their freedom."

In a somewhat different account of this address, published in the Washington Post, President Taft is reported to have asked—

Is it possible that little as this Democratic administration knows about the Philippines they are going to let them go and defeat our efforts to raise and educate the Filipino people? Is it possible that it is going to do that with no foundation whatsoever and without the approval of somebody who knows the islands? I hope not.

On the 6th of December last President Taft sent a special message to Congress, in which he expressed in rather vigorous terms and at considerable length his disapprobation of this Philippine independence measure. Among other things he told us in this message that—

To confer independence upon the Filipinos now is therefore to subject the great mass of their people to the dominance of an oligarchical and probably exploiting minority.

A present declaration even of future independence—

He informed Congress—would retard progress by the dissension and disorder it would arouse.

It has been to me a matter of no little regret, to say nothing of surprise, that President Taft, for whom I entertain personally the highest regard and the very kindest feelings, should have thought fit to severely criticize and attack in a message to Congress a measure there pending.

It is quite true that it is the constitutional duty of the President to "from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient," but this message neither conveyed information nor recommended legislation to the Congress. On the contrary, it severely denounced and vigorously opposed pending legislation. If the President shall disapprove any bill which has passed the two Houses of Congress, he is empowered by the Constitution to return it to the House in which it originated, along with his objections; but I have failed to find anywhere in that instrument warrant for the course pursued by the President in this case.

But I am not so much concerned over the method employed by the President to make public his views in respect to this measure as I am in the views themselves.

With great deference for his superior knowledge and information, I must nevertheless dissent from the unsupported opinion expressed by him that to confer independence upon the Filipinos would subject the masses "to the dominance of an oligarchical and probably exploiting minority," and I believe that his statement that "a present declaration even of future independence" would arouse disorder and retard progress is opposed to the enlightened opinion and best judgment of a vast majority of the American people.

Mr. Speaker, I not only assert, but I shall undertake to prove by incontrovertible facts, that the government which the United States has imposed upon the Filipinos, and under the dominance of which they are now forced to live, is an oligarchy of the most intolerable, despotic, and unrestricted character.

I shall attempt no reply to President Taft's alleged characterization of the pending Philippine independence bill as "suicidal and defective"; nor shall I endeavor at this time to convince the House that the Filipinos are capable of governing themselves and that it is the duty of the United States to grant them their independence. It will be time enough to discuss the merits and demerits of this measure when it comes up for consideration. I hope to have the opportunity in the near future of presenting at greater length than could now be done the reasons which impel my belief that some such measure as that which seems to have so greatly aroused the opposition of President Taft will prove a wise and just solution of the Philippine problem. In the meantime I shall avail myself of this, the first opportunity that has presented itself, to make reply to a few of the statements in which he is alleged to have indulged at the Ohio Society dinner.

The United States, he is reported to have said, should treat the Philippines just as Great Britain treats Canada and Australia, but should not free them under any circumstances. When, may I ask, did he reach this conclusion? Canada and Australia are in every essential respect, if not absolutely and completely, self-governing colonies. Each has its own elective parliament; each makes its own laws, lays its own taxes, and collects and disburses its own revenues. Great Britain exercises absolutely no control over the domestic affairs of either of these colonies. They not only control their internal affairs, but they negotiate their commercial treaties, and they lay their tariff duties, and in this and other respects are more self-governing and autonomous than any State in our American Union.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Does Great Britain reserve any veto power as to legislation passed by Australia or the Canadian Parliaments?

Mr. JONES. I am coming to that directly. It is true that they do not select their own governors general, but it is also true that not within the memory of living man has the veto power been exercised by a governor general of either colony. The people of Canada and Australia are virtually as free and independent as those of England herself.

We are indebted to Australia for the secret-ballot system in vogue in every State in our Union. I wonder, too, if President Taft knows that pure democracy prevails to such an extent in Australia that the initiative, referendum, and recall have already been adopted there. Surely he, of all men, would not like to see the recall of judges introduced in the Philippines. How is it with the Philippine Islands?

The act of Congress under which they are governed was passed more than a decade ago, and President Taft, more than any other human being, is responsible for its provisions. The governor general, vice governor, members of the Philippine Commission, and the heads of the various executive departments are all appointed by the President of the United States. The legislature since 1907 has consisted of two houses, this appointive commission, which is known as the upper house, and an elective assembly. This body legislates for the civilized, Christianized people, but the commission, under the organic act, is the sole legislative body for the non-Christian and uncivilized tribes, and exercises supreme and exclusive legislative authority over all their territory, their lives, their property, and their public revenues. Let us see what has been the practical operation—some of the actual, tangible results—of this anomalous condition of affairs. In the first place, no measure originating in the assembly can become a law unless it meets the approval of the commission, and, of course, the reverse of this proposition is also true. Realizing that disagreements would inevitably arise between the commission and the assembly, and that the annual appropriation bills for the support of the government might thus fail of passage, the organic act provides that in such event "an amount equal to the sums appropriated in the last appropriation bills for such purposes shall be deemed to be appropriated, and until the legislature shall act in such behalf the treasurer may, with the advice of the governor, make the payments necessary for the purposes aforesaid." The purpose of this law is, as has been said by another, to provide for the contingency of an honest difference of opinion between these two houses as well as for unreasonable or factious attempts on the part of either house to embarrass the government by withholding the supplies necessary for its existence.

Twice has the legislature failed to pass these supply bills. One of the causes for the disagreements which led to the deadlock between the two branches of the legislature and which resulted in these failures to pass appropriation bills was that the assembly insisted that the salaries of the members of the commission, who were also heads of executive departments, should be so reduced as to make them more nearly correspond to those received by members of the American Cabinet. But the chief cause of disagreement was the insistence of the commission upon the right which it claimed to appropriate large sums of money out of the public revenues of the insular treasury, to be expended upon what is known as the Benguet Road, without the concurrence and despite the earnest opposition of the other coordinate branch of the legislature.

The Benguet Road is a highway less than 20 miles in length, built at a cost of several millions of dollars in gold through a mountain gorge to a health resort or residential park, called Baguio, to which place, at great expense, the seat of government is transferred from Manila for several months each year, and where American officials have handsome homes, clubhouses, polo grounds, and other sources of recreation and amusement. The Filipinos have from the beginning been violently opposed to these vast and absolutely inexcusable expenditures. Not only has it cost millions to build this automobile road through rugged mountains, a highway that is used solely for purposes of recreation and pleasure, but the cost of its upkeep is perhaps not less than $100,000 a year, and in times of great freshets it has been necessary to rebuild entire sections at an enormous cost. Nothing that our Government has done in the Philippine Islands has aroused more feeling and created more resentment on the part of the helpless Filipinos of every station in life than this wanton and indefensible disregard of their wishes and interests. [Applause.] This one act of the Philippine Commission has greatly shaken, if not destroyed, the confidence of the Filipino people in the American sense of justice and fair dealing. It has removed every vestige of any sentiment which may have existed in favor of American annexation. Is it then to be wondered at that the assembly, composed as it is entirely of natives, refused to lend itself to such inexcusable and, under the conditions of poverty so common in the islands, criminally wasteful expenditures of the public moneys as I have attempted to describe?

The pretext for the commission's action was that the Benguet Road traversed a part of a non-Christian Province, and that inasmuch as the commission exercised exclusive legislative functions over non-Christian territory it was empowered to expend any amount of the public funds it might desire in the construction and maintenance of that road, and that without either the concurrence or approval of the assembly. The members of the assembly claimed, on the other hand, and with reason, that the commission was only empowered to expend the public money in non-Christian Provinces for the use and benefit of the non-Christian and uncivilized tribes residing therein, and that it was a flagrant violation of law and a perversion of public funds to use them in the construction of an enormously expensive automobile road leading to a mountain resort maintained exclusively for the benefit of themselves and other rich residents of Manila.

It was these disagreements between the commission and the assembly that resulted in the nonpassage of the annual supply bills of which I have spoken, and I believe that every liberty-loving and right-thinking American citizen, when he comes to understand their motives, will applaud Speaker Osmena and his legislative associates for the courage and patriotism which they thus twice displayed. [Applause.]

Whether or not the commission deliberately planned to bring about this unfortunate condition of affairs in order to deprive the Filipinos of any control over their revenues the result has been the same. Acting under the authority of the provision of law which I have just quoted the Governor General has ordered the appropriation of a sum equal to the total appropriations made in the previous year for the support of the Government. Having thus gotten into his hands more than $12,000,000 in 1911 and somewhat less than $14,000,000 in 1912 of the public revenues of the Filipino people the Governor General proceeded to expend these large sums according to his own will, and as in his sole judgment seemed desirable, and with an utter disregard for the purposes for which the prior legislative appropriations had been made. Is there, I ask, a Representative upon this floor who, after reading the law under which Gov. Forbes is supposed to have acted, will not denounce his actions as both arbitrary and illegal? Many an official has been impeached for less than this. Baguio and the Benguet Road were, of course, liberally provided for, new offices were created, and the salaries of existing offices increased. It is needless to say that the salaries of the heads of executive departments were not decreased. It is asserted by a former member of the commission that there were as many as 123 new offices thus created, among them a secretary to the Governor General at an annual salary of $4,500, and it is a most amazing and stupendous fact that the expenditures on account of bureaus and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, were $9,638,369.80, as against $8,318,051.56 for the next preceding year, the excess being a mere bagatelle of $1,320,318.24 in gold. A people whose self-restraint is equal to orderly and peaceful submission to acts of tyranny and oppression such as these are surely capable of governing themselves.

It is but just to say that there were members of the commission who questioned the legality of these executive acts, and that at least one American member formally and vigorously protested against them. These protests, however, were wholly unavailing. In pursuing this arbitrary and, as I charge, absolutely illegal course the Governor General acted, at least, so far as is publicly known, without legal advice, although not himself a lawyer. He consulted neither the solicitor general nor the attorney general of the islands, and, as I am informed, these legal advisers of the Government did not agree with the Governor General in his construction of the law or approve his action. Certain it is that the ablest lawyer on the commission, the Hon. Charles B. Elliott, formerly a member of the Supreme Court of the State of Minnesota, who was recently requested to resign as a result of his emphatic disapproval of the course of Gov. Gen. Forbes, regarded the latter's action as a most flagrant disregard of both the spirit and the letter of the law, for his opinion to this effect is upon record in Manila, and was rendered long before he had any thought of resigning as a member of the commission. Whether or not the Filipinos are capable of self-government, I question the right of Gov. Gen. Forbes to longer govern them.

President Taft tells us that "a declaration even of future independence would retard progress by the dissension and disorder it would arouse." I am curious to know what results he thinks such arbitrary and illegal acts as the one to which I have just called attention are likely to produce. To my mind the fact that the Filipino people have exercised such self-control as to refrain from even the semblance of disorder under conditions so inexpressibly hard and cruelly exasperating as these constitutes the highest tribute to their self-restraint and respect for constituted authority. [Applause.]

Whenever attention is directed to acts such as these on the part of the government which we have set up in the Philippines, the reply has always been glibly made, as if that were sufficient in itself to disarm criticism and forever silence all complaint, that within the past 10 years public schools have greatly multiplied in the Philippines; that the inhabitants of the islands have made wonderful progress in the acquisition of knowledge of various kinds; that sanitary conditions have improved; and that many important public works have been inaugurated as a result of our beneficent rule. The Filipino who does not accept this reply as conclusive of the question is frequently denounced as an ingrate. Indeed, his failure to accept such reasoning as conclusive is cited as evidence of his incapacity for self-government. Nobody denies these things. Nobody denies that there has been great educational and material progress in the Philippines. I will even admit, for it is a fact, that the parcel post was in the Philippines before Congress could be convinced that it was not too expensive to be thought of for the farmers of the United States. But it must not be forgotten that every dollar of the money contributed for these purposes came out of the pockets of the Filipinos. Nor must it be forgotten that much of it, as I have shown, was needlessly and shamefully wasted, and that the benefits derived from its expenditure, even in those cases where the expenditure was proper, have rarely, if ever, been commensurate with the cost.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. MURRAY. What evidence has the gentleman as to the accuracy of the statements which he has just made, which have shocked me and I have no doubt shocked many Members of this House?

Mr. Chairman, perhaps I ought to say that I have no disposition to be out of harmony with the gentleman in his statement of the facts. I have been shocked to hear them and I have wondered whether or not the gentleman has any plans for verification or proof of them, which I think ought to go with all such statements.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman that I will submit, and ask to have printed in connection with my remarks, a statement made by a former member of the commission itself.

I have already stated that one member of the commission, Judge Elliott, of Minnesota, has placed upon record in Manila his protest against the construction which Gov. Forbes has placed upon the act of Congress which I have quoted. I will further state to the gentleman that he will find all the information he desires with respect to the Benguet Road if he will read the reports of the investigations of the friar lands sales.

Mr. MURRAY. Of course, Mr. Chairman, in such matters as have been referred to they can throw no possible light in regard to the alleged arbitrary and illegal conduct that has taken place with respect to these appropriations.

Mr. JONES. I may say to my friend that there is not a particle of question as to the action of the Governor General to which I have called attention, and I am sure that every word I have said on that subject will be verified by the Insular Affairs Bureau in this city. These facts are well known and are not questioned in any quarter, so far as I know. It is not denied that Gov. Forbes holds that in disbursing the public funds, if the legislature fails to pass the regular supply bills, he is not confined to the objects named in the last regularly enacted bill.

When the opportunity is afforded me I shall undertake to give this House some idea as to what extent the government we have imposed upon the Filipinos has been extravagant and wasteful. The American people have not the slightest conception of what has been going on in the Philippines. Whilst the head of every bureau—and they are almost innumerable—is provided with a costly automobile, the upkeep of which is also paid for by the Filipinos, there are hundreds of thousands of natives who can not afford shoes for their bare feet.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does that statement go beyond the question of expressing a view as to the right of the Governor General to expend the moneys? Does it go to the question of extravagance in expenditure or misappropriation of funds?

Mr. JONES. It goes to the question of both extravagance and misappropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no knowledge, and I want to find out.

Mr. JONES. It goes to both.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I would say, in the same connection, is it not best for the gentleman to print as a part of his remarks the opinion given by Judge Elliott in relation to the power of the Governor General?

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman that I have in my possession a long and exhaustive legal document bearing upon this subject. I had not intended to put that in the RECORD, but I can put it in if gentlemen so desire. It is in the form of a letter from one of the commissioners to the auditor of the insular government.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I would prefer to have the gentleman defer his question until I have concluded what I am now saying; then I shall be glad to reply to any question he may address to me.

Mr. MURRAY. I want to have incorporated here the suggestions that I have in my mind, that the gentleman has made statements which are in the nature of very serious charges, and I think we ought to have the letter to which the gentleman refers as the basis of the presentment.

Mr. JONES. I will publish in connection with my remarks a statement given out by a former member of the commission which fully confirms my statement.

This reckless extravagance and studied disregard for the interests of the poor and defenseless Filipinos has led, as might have been expected, to a deficit, or, perhaps, it would be more accurate to say a deficit was only averted during the past fiscal year by the transference of $1,698,513.82 from the gold-standard fund to the general funds in the Treasury. Unless, therefore, great reduction in expenditures is made during the year 1913 there will be a very large deficit, for I can not believe that the commission will again invade the gold-standard fund, although, I confess, that I am prepared for anything it may do. For the commission has not in the past hesitated to lay its hands upon a, if anything, more sacred fund than this.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman explain the gold-standard fund, because the gentleman sitting in front of me does not understand it.

Mr. JONES. The gold-standard fund, of course, is a fund created for the protection of the silver currency in the islands, the pesos and other fractional silver currency.

The President said in New York that "the Philippines have cost the United States to date only $3,000,000 for civil expenses, and that this money was appropriated to save them from starvation." Well do I remember that Congress donated this money to save the famishing Filipinos from starvation, but does President Taft know that a considerable part of it was expended on the Benguet automobile road, of which I have spoken? The act of Congress declared that the money should be expended "for the relief of distress in the Philippine Islands." In the estimation of the commission these starving Filipinos stood more in need of an automobile road than of the rice to purchase which the American people in their generosity gave this money.

But at the proper time and in due season those who are responsible for conditions in the Philippines will have graver charges than these to answer. I predict, for instance, that somebody will be required to explain why it was that three prominent American officials of the city of Manila were not removed from office as was recommended by the committee appointed to investigate the grafting charges preferred against them. Some of their subordinates were prosecuted and convicted; but, notwithstanding the findings and recommendations of a committee of investigation, one of whom was Solicitor General Harvey and another Gen. Bandholtz, chief of the constabulary, their superiors have escaped all punishment and two of them are still enjoying the salaries of their lucrative offices. The third has since been removed from office for usury and extortion. The head of this powerful triumvirate, the man who was kept in office by the Governor General, notwithstanding his grafting, and who was removed during the absence of the Governor General last year, was then and is now the Manila correspondent of a great American newspaper. He realizes, of course, that the Filipinos do not love him, and does anybody imagine that his American readers will ever be told through his published letters that the Filipinos are capable of self-government? And it is upon such disinterested and unprejudiced testimony as this that the American people are asked to pronounce the Filipinos incapable of self-government.

But, Mr. Speaker, I shall not pursue this particular subject any further.

I think I have said enough to convince the most doubting Thomas that there is not the least similitude between the government which we have forcibly set up in the Philippines and those enjoyed by the people of Canada and Australia.

If President Taft really thinks, as he is reported to have said, that we should treat the Philippines just as Great Britain treats Canada and Australia, why, may I ask, has he postponed until the very end of his administration to offer this gratuitous advice to his Democratic successor? Why has he not made some effort during the four years of his administration to give the Filipinos a government in some slight respect modeled after those the like of which he said they should have? It was within his power long ago to have substituted a liberal, progressive, and practically autonomous government, one at least resembling in some respects those of Canada and Australia, for the irresponsible and odious autocracy under which they are now governed.

I shall not now consume much of the time of the House in combating the President's statement that the expense of maintaining troops in the islands is practically nothing.

It will be recalled that in response to a resolution of this House asking for information upon this subject the President sent a message to Congress in July last in which he declared that aside from certain enumerated direct appropriations, the cost accruing to the United States on account of the military and naval operations in and about the archipelago and from the construction of fortifications there could not be determined with any degree of accuracy. The problem presented by the resolution, he said, was "practically insoluble." Now he is moved to say, because of his violent opposition to even a declaration by Congress of any future purpose to grant the Filipinos their independence, that this cost is practically nothing.

To me this is a most incomprehensible, a most amazing statement.

I shall not attempt to inform the House, even approximately, what our military and naval operations in the Philippines have cost the United States from the beginning of American occupation up to the present time. Ten years ago it was variously estimated at from $200,000,000 to $600,000,000. On June 19, 1902, former Secretary of War ROOT, in response to a Senate resolution, informed Congress that our military occupation had cost up to May 1 of that year $170,326,586.11. He gave no information as to what had been the cost of our naval operations and none with relation to the Marine Corps, but he did undertake to say with a remarkable "degree of accuracy" what had been the cost of our military occupation. Surely the present Secretary of War could, with an equal degree of accuracy, have informed the President what military occupation at least has cost the United States from May 1, 1902, up to the present time. Secretary ROOT's figures were based upon the assumption that if the Army had not been in the Philippines an equal number of troops, exclusive of Philippine Scouts, would have been maintained in the United States, which, to my mind, is a very violent assumption. The most casual examination of Mr. ROOT's report will make it apparent that he excluded from his account many large items of cost which should properly have been included. But, as I have pointed out, he did not assume to say what had been expended by the United States on account of our naval operations and those of the Marine Corps, and I venture the assertion that $600,000,000, the estimate of the late Senator HOAR, is much nearer correct than the figures furnished by the ex-Secretary of War—what the grand total really is will never be even approximately known. One reason for this is that it is not possible in numberless instances to segregate the items which are properly chargeable to military occupation of the islands from those which are not so chargeable, when these appropriations are made in lump sums for the support of the Army as a whole.

Having made these somewhat general observations, I shall now proceed to give the House some definite information in the way of figures, which if they represent, as they do, only a part of the expenditures being made in the Philippines out of the Treasury of the United States, will at least serve to show that what President Taft may regard as practically nothing is, in the estimation of most people, a very considerable sum.

We have for the past few years kept stationed in the Philippines approximately 12,000 Regular troops and 6,000 native scouts, all of whom are maintained at the cost of the United States. At this time the scouts number 5,660.

It is denied by some of our imperialistic friends that the cost of the maintenance of these 12,000 United States troops in the Philippines should be considered in estimating the expense to us of holding them. They say that the strength of the Regular Army would have been maintained at its present proportions even if the United States had not possessed the islands. I challenge their statement, but even if it were true the expense of our military establishment in the islands would still be far from inconsiderable.

The Army appropriation bill which passed this House on Tuesday last carried an item of $1,069,470.66 for the pay of the Philippine Scouts for the next fiscal year, and another item of $500,000 to be expended for permanent quarters and barracks for our troops in the islands. It will not be contended, I think, that these scouts would be needed or ever available were we to withdraw from the Philippines, and in such an event we would not be required to spend half a million dollars a year for the erection of permanent barracks and costly officers' quarters, as we have been doing for years in furtherance of elaborate plans involving an expenditure of millions of dollars. But enlisted men get 20 and officers 10 per cent additional pay when engaged in foreign service, and this Army bill carried a little item of $995,000, practically every dollar of which is paid to our troops serving in the Philippines, for service in the Canal Zone, in Panama, Hawaii, and Porto Rico is not regarded under the law as foreign service.

I state this to anticipate the objection of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], and the only part of this $995,000 that is not paid in the Philippine Islands is a very trifling sum paid to a battalion of troops in Alaska.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that perhaps it would be fairer in debate to anticipate something that the gentleman from Kentucky has warranted the gentleman from Virginia in believing he was going to contend.

Mr. JONES. I beg the gentleman's pardon, if I mistook his intention.

Mr. SHERLEY. I trust the gentleman's other conclusions are based on more detailed study.

Mr. JONES. They are based on figures and facts that I do not think the gentleman from Kentucky or anybody else can successfully challenge.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Is it a fact that our Government has to pay a tariff on all of the supplies that are taken to the Philippine Islands from countries other than the United States for the support of the American soldiery in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. JONES. I believe that is true.

These three items alone aggregate $2,574,470.66, a sum which can scarcely be called "practically nothing."

The fortification bill which we are now considering carries for fortifications, searchlights, repair of torpedo-repair structures, mining casemates, and so forth, all to be expended in the Philippines, $782,350. In addition to this sum it contains appropriations aggregating $720,000 to be expended in our insular possessions, the bulk of which is to be spent in the Philippines. The naval, general deficiency, and sundry civil bills, yet to be reported, will carry large items for the Philippines, as has always been the case heretofore.

What it costs to feed, clothe, house, and otherwise care for 6,000 scouts in the Philippines I can not say, but the sum far exceeds their actual pay, which I have shown to be $1,069,470.66 annually. What it costs to provide for the 12,000 Regular troops in the Philippines over and above what it would cost were they kept in continental United States I can not even guess. It is well within bounds to say, however, that the items I have mentioned will exceed in the aggregate $6,000,000. Is this a mere bagatelle?

The Trans-Pacific Fleet consists of nine Army transports, not all of which, however, are in commission at the same time. The cost of the operation and maintenance of these vessels, which are used in the transportation of troops to and from the Philippines and in transporting animals and supplies for the use of the army of occupation, is enormous. The ordinary repairs for each one of them, for each and every round trip, cost $2,500, and occasionally they require overhauling, at an expense of hundreds of thousands of dollars each.

To give some idea as to what this transport service is costing the United States, I may state that in 1908 repairs to transports and launches amounted to $606,350.20, whilst the fuel bill for that year was $632,500. In 1909 these repairs amounted to $387,212, in 1910 to $489,921, and in 1911 to $331,278. The fuel bills were even larger. Just what it costs annually to man and operate these transports I can not say, but for several years the shore expenses of the transport service, such as office and warehouse rental, wharfage charges, employees, and so forth, have averaged around $1,500,000 annually.

But in addition to the trans-Pacific service there is also an interisland transport service owned, maintained, and operated by the United States. This service costs more than $500,000 annually. Will it be said that this Army transport service would be necessary were we out of the Philippines?

I have said nothing as to the railroad transportation of troops en route to and from the Philippines, but it is several hundred thousand dollars annually. Nor have I attempted to enumerate the almost numberless other purposes and objects, incident to our occupation, for which we are annually expending large sums of money in the Philippines. Some of these are water and sewer systems, artesian wells, shelter for troops and animals, storehouse rentals, hospitals, clubhouses, military telegraph and telephone lines, a small army of civilian employees, interpreters, guides, and so forth. I have had neither the time nor the opportunity to dig all of these items out of the many different appropriation bills which have carried them, and it is needless to say that the custodians of the accounts in which they are buried have not volunteered me any assistance. The official reports show that for the year 1911 the Quartermaster's Department alone paid out on account of the Philippines more than $5,000,000, and that the annual expenditures by this department by reason of our military occupation of the islands, leaving out the years when war existed, were more than $6,000,000.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, in order that I may understand clearly the purpose of the gentleman in collecting together these figures, may I inquire—and the inquiry is for information—if the point he is developing is that they are so expensive that we ought to get rid of them?

Mr. JONES. My primary purpose is to show that the President of the United States, when he said in his speech before the Ohio Society in New York that they cost the United States practically nothing, was greatly mistaken. I also hope to demonstrate incidentally that the Philippine Islands are costing the American people so much that the sooner we free ourselves of them the better it will be for the American people.

Mr. SAUNDERS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Approximately, can the gentleman say what will be the aggregate of these totals which the gentleman has given us?

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will wait, I will come to that in a few moments.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. In relation to the transport service, does the gentleman know the transports run to Honolulu, to Guam, to Alaska, and even down to the Isthmus of Panama?

Mr. JONES. No; I did not know that.

Mr. KAHN. That is a fact.

Mr. JONES. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I know that these Pacific transports do, Mr. Chairman, touch at Honolulu, and they do touch at ports in Japan for the purpose of coaling. I do not know that they always stop at Guam. It is considerably out of the way to touch at Guam. I know of no reason why they should do so regularly. I do know, however, they do not run to Panama. We have an Atlantic Fleet of transports, several of the ships of which are now out of commission at Newport News, in my district. These ships may be sometimes sent to Panama.

Mr. KAHN. An occasional transport goes to Panama——

Mr. JONES. I have never known of one.

Mr. KAHN. And to Guam also.

Mr. JONES. There may have been such instances, but if so, the steamers that are in commission, and which run regularly between San Francisco and Manila, are not, I think, ever so used. I think the gentleman will agree to that.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, all are taken out of commission from time to time. We have four transports that are used between Manila and San Francisco.

Mr. JONES. I will say to my friend I have very little time and that I must hurry on.

Mr. KAHN. I did not want to interfere with the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. I can not now state from memory what it costs annually to maintain at Washington the large Bureau of Insular Affairs, but I think the amount exceeds $1,000,000.

Within the last 10 years we have expended in fortifying the entrances to Manila and Subic Bays more than $11,000,000.

In the figures which I have thus submitted I have charged nothing against the 12,000 Regular troops that are stationed in the islands except their additional pay for foreign service and their transportation to and from the islands; but, in my judgment, it is manifestly proper that their whole pay, as well as the entire cost of their subsistence, should be so charged. If we have no use at home for these troops, then the Army should to that extent be reduced. But we are told by Col. Goethals that 25,000 troops will be required as a permanent garrison at the Panama Canal.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I would just like to say that Col. Goethals's testimony, made before the Committee on Naval Affairs and subsequently having that testimony before the Committee on Appropriations, does not warrant the newspaper statement constantly made that he thinks 25,000 men should be put there.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman that I got my information from the newspapers, but I will ask him how many troops does he think ought to be stationed in Panama?

Mr. SHERLEY. He is in accord with the policy of the department that now contemplates something over 8,000 men.

Mr. JONES. If that be true, then——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman to yield me 15 minutes more in which to conclude my remarks.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman pleases, I purposely did not take any time in my own right, so it is not mine to give, but I would be very glad to ask that the gentleman be permitted to continue for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia have permission to continue for 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES. I hope in the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, that no questions will be asked me until I have concluded what I wish to say. It will require all of 15 minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, in regard to Col. Goethals, I heard him make the statement before the Committee on Naval Affairs, and he said it would be necessary to have 25,000 troops there, and that is what he asked for and desired.

Mr. JONES. I thank the gentleman. If, then, instead of recruiting our Army to that extent, we transfer the 12,000 troops from the Philippines to the canal, we will save at least $12,000,000 annually, since the exact cost per man for maintaining our military establishment was, last year, $913.23. Within the past five years it has ranged from that sum to $1,142 per man, and it costs much more, of course, to maintain troops in the Philippines than in the United States.

When to the cost of the Army of occupation of the Philippines there is added our expenditures on account of the Navy and the Marine Corps, which I shall not undertake to discuss, it will, in my opinion, be found that it is costing the American people to hold the Philippines not less than $40,000,000 annually. This sum exceeds the total annual value of the commerce between the Philippines and the United States.

We have expended within the past 10 years more than $1,500,000 in the construction and equipment of the naval station at Olongapo, in addition to some $1,275,000 on a floating dry dock located at that place. Large sums, too, have been expended at the Cavite naval station, and other large sums for naval hospitals, prisons, magazines, and other objects too numerous to mention.

There may be those who will question my judgment as to the sum total of these expenditures, but I venture to believe that there will be few who will agree with President Taft that they constitute "practically nothing." The chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, however, has actually gone upon record as saying that "even the additional cost of the support of the troops in the Philippines above the cost of support of the same number in the United States can not properly be regarded as part of the cost of the Philippines." Indeed, he would even deny that the cost of maintaining the Philippine Scouts can be considered a part of the cost of the Philippines to this country. If, therefore, these remarkable ex cathedra statements are to be accepted, the Philippines have certainly cost us nothing. But they are "affirmation pure and simple."

The only comment that I shall make upon the President's alleged statement that were he a politician he could wish the Democrats no worse fortune than the passage of the Jones bill, since its passage would result in a mess and muss which would forever return to plague its makers, is that if the Democratic Party is to be deterred from keeping the solemn pledges it has made to the American people, and upon which it was given control of every branch of the Federal Government, by the political prophecies of one whose administrative policies have been so emphatically discredited and repudiated by the voters of every State of the Union, save only those of Utah and Vermont, its defeat in 1916 will be as deservedly overwhelming as was that of the Republican Party in November last. But whilst I recognize President Taft's great ability and most cheerfully concede the purity of his motives, it must be admitted, I think, by his most ardent political followers that he has not achieved great success as a political prophet.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. If, when I get through, I have a moment left, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, it has been made most manifest of late that the administration has been bringing to bear every possible influence, commercial, political, and ecclesiastical, in its efforts to defeat the declared purpose of the Democratic Party to give the Filipinos their independence. The country is being told that the incoming Democratic administration is too ignorant as to conditions in the Philippines even to attempt a change of the policy which the Republican Party inaugurated and has been pursuing for the past 10 years in respect to them. All those who have any personal and intimate knowledge of the Filipino people and of the real conditions existing in the islands are, we are told, unanimously of the opinion that it would be "suicidal" to recognize the independence of the Philippines.

I readily admit that there is apparently great unanimity of opinion in respect to this subject on the part of the people from whom the administration secures its information, but I absolutely deny that its sources of information are either the most dependable or the only sources.

Many of our naval and military people favor the indefinite retention of the Philippines for purely personal reasons. Naval officers argue, and with reason, that holding the islands will mean the enlargement of the Navy, and any increase in our naval establishment means more rapid promotion for the personnel. Army officers have told me that our withdrawal from the Philippines would mean a reduction of the size of the Army which would be prejudicial to them. Of course, the Americans who have gone to the islands for purposes of exploitation are opposed to their independence.

But the largest and perhaps the most influential class from which the administration derives its information is that of the American officeholders whose names are truly legion. These men are naturally in full accord with the policies of the administration to whom they owe their positions. They wish to continue to hold their jobs, and it is absurd to suppose that they will ever give public utterance to opinions not in accord with those held by the powers that be. Many of them have no sympathy for the poor Filipinos, and some, at least, despise them and take no pains to disguise the fact.

If the American public are to seriously heed testimony derived from sources such as these, we may as well abandon now and forever all hope that the Filipinos are ever to be given their independence, and that the American people are ever to be relieved of the enormous financial burdens which their retention yearly entails.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are not left in that complete ignorance as to conditions in the Philippines which the President assumes to be the case. Not all Americans who have resided in the Philippines and who are thoroughly well-informed as to conditions there, are either exploiters or officeholders, and these have never hesitated to give the true facts, although experiencing difficulty in getting them before the American public. And now that there is to be a change of administration which will remove the restraint which has heretofore been placed upon the officeholders, we may expect to receive some valuable information from that source.

The newspapers are publishing extracts from the last annual report of the Philippine Commission, given out by the War Department, a report which I have not as yet seen, which are, as was to have been expected, fully in line with the statements which have so frequently been given out by the administration and intended, of course, to create in America a sentiment averse to Philippine independence. I do not believe that this last expiring wail of this American-made, law-defying, self-interested oligarchy, which, when legislating for the Filipinos, sits behind closed doors, will accomplish the intended purpose. A governing body which has plunged the Philippines in debt, defeated the administration of justice, and violated, as I have shown, the organic act of Congress, will, when these facts are generally known, become so discredited in the eyes of the people of the United States that it will be a waste of time to make reply to their representations.

Mr. Speaker, I now ask leave to publish in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, a resolution unanimously passed by the Philippine Assembly, praying Congress to investigate the conduct of Dean C. Worcester, a member of the commission; an interview from Judge Charles B. Elliott, of Minnesota, late a member of the Philippine Commission, recently published in a Minneapolis newspaper; a letter received by me from Mr. L. M. Southworth, a prominent member of the Manila bar and for eight years a resident of the Philippines; and a letter written by Mr. William S. Lyon, an American who has been engaged for eleven or more years in farming and other business pursuits in the Philippines. These are not prejudiced or interested witnesses. Their long and intimate acquaintance with the Filipino people entitles their testimony to great weight.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will be glad, if I have the time left, to answer any question which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] desires to ask me.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I wanted to ask the gentleman this question: Can the gentleman state whether it is true or not that the President elect has declared in favor of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. JONES. I will say to my friend that he has doubtless read, just as I have, and other Members of the House, what the President elect said upon that subject in his speech at Staunton. I am not authorized to speak for the President elect, but I will say this to the gentleman: President Elect Wilson is a Democrat; he is a man of honor, and he stands squarely on the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore, and I do not doubt for a moment but that he favors Philippine independence. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting certain documents to which he has referred. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letters and papers are as follows:

JUDGE ELLIOTT'S INTERVIEW.

Judge Charles B. Elliott, Minneapolis jurist, who announced in Washington a week ago that his resignation as secretary of commerce and labor of the Philippine Islands was at the request of President Taft, and who reached Minneapolis late yesterday, talked freely at the Hampshire Arms last evening of the disagreements with Gov. Gen. W. Cameron Forbes which led to his retirement. Judge Elliott did not feel like discussing the matter when in Washington.

"I am perfectly satisfied," said Judge Elliott, to quit office upon the issues which are involved. Congress is going to investigate official matters in the Philippines, and my protest will be found on record in regard to matters which will be found subjects for severe criticism.

"In a general way conditions in the Philippines are good, and an immense amount of good is being done, but in the administration of details there is much that is outrageous. Two things are a public scandal in the islands now, and will be found when the congressional investigation is made. One is the extravagant and often improper use of public funds by direction of the Governor General and the other is his interference with the administration of justice.

CHARGES DISREGARD OF LAW.

"The only charge against me, if it can be called a charge, was that Mr. Forbes and I did not work harmoniously together. The record shows that there is no criticism of my official work, and unless it shows that I should not have resigned. Mr. Forbes's complaint was that I was an obstructionist. I confess that I have been. I have protested as far as I was able against what I felt to be illegal acts. I have fought them with some pretty drastic opinions, I admit. I have said, and still say, that it is an infernal outrage to run the government of the Philippines with so little regard for law. We are trying to teach these people how to run a government, and that sort of conduct is setting them a poor example. I opposed Gov. Gen. Forbes continually on those matters, without any personal feeling on my part. I did not know there was any on his until after my resignation had been requested.

"Gov. Gen. Forbes preceded me to the United States on our vacations last spring. He was still in this country when I left recently on my return to the islands. I had no inkling then of any complaint. He did not let me know that there was any issue between us before the President or the department. Evidently he did not care to meet me and discuss the matter before officials at Washington.

TALKED WITH PRESIDENT.

"President Taft visited Mr. Forbes at Boston just a week before I sailed. I saw the President after he had seen Forbes, and he knew nothing then of any complaint. He talked with me about when Forbes would leave and about my departure. Evidently within a few days after I sailed Mr. Forbes came to Washington and told the President that I would have to resign, as we could not get along together. In the circumstances I was wholly unprepared for the cable message I received. That is the only thing I have any personal feeling about. I should have been saved that unnecessary trip to Europe with my family and preparations for return to the Philippines, which cost me about $2,000."

With regard to his differences with the Governor General, Judge Elliott said that some of them were on trivial matters of administration, and with him never have been personal, but evidently were taken as personal by Mr. Forbes.

ALLEGES WASTE OF MONEY.

"He has been in wretched health, which I think has had much to do with it," said Judge Elliott. "He is personally a fine fellow, but he is impatient of restrictions; not being a lawyer, is impatient of the law; and being a millionaire, he seems to have a contempt for economy. He took the government three years ago with a surplus of $3,500,000, and at the end of last July had run it into a deficit of nearly $4,000,000.

"My differences with him began over such matters as this: As secretary of commerce and police I had the distribution of $1,500,000 a year for roads and bridges. It was to be spent in the discretion of the secretary. Mr. Forbes often wanted to direct the expenditure of some of this fund, and frequently where it was not needed, except to placate a deputy in the legislature from some district. In cases where I did not consider the expenditure was justified I would decline. I offered sometimes to approve an item if he would request it in writing, but that he never would do, and I declined to take the responsibility otherwise.

"Mr. Forbes attempted to get legislation through to concentrate more power in his hands. I opposed such legislation as a member of the senate, and believed I was justified.

QUARREL OVER $12,000,000.

"Our most important difference, however, arose about a year ago. The legislature refused to pass the regular appropriation bill for the support of the government. For such a contingency Congress has provided that an amount equal to the appropriation for the previous year shall then be deemed to be appropriated and paid out by the treasurer. Gov. Gen. Forbes took the ground that the sum of $12,000,000 in gold was thereby placed at his disposal, to spend according to his own judgment. He and his clerks drew up a new appropriation bill and declared it in effect, changing salaries, changing the methods of disposal, and creating 123 new positions, including a secretary to the Governor General, at $4,500 a year.

"I took a stand against this. I held that legally the old appropriations were merely renewed during the interregnum until a new bill could be passed. I asked that the question be referred to the attorney general of the islands, which was refused. I then asked that it be referred to the Attorney General of the United States. Mr. Forbes refused to do either, and proceeded without a legal opinion. The senate referred the matter to a committee of three commissioners, including Señor Areneta, secretary of finance and justice, former attorney general and the leading native lawyer, Commissioner Palma, and myself. We held unanimously that the old appropriations merely held over. Nevertheless, the Governor General continued to dispense the funds at his own discretion, and still is doing so.

"He prepared one bill in December, 1911, dating it in July, when the old appropriations expired. He was advised from Washington to cut out some of his numerous new appointees, so he prepared a new bill in March, and dated it back again to July. As a member of the senate I opposed confirming his secretary, and the senate was against it on legal grounds. In order not to reflect on the young man we asked Mr. Forbes to withdraw the appointment. He did so, but immediately appointed him again, and is still employing him, without confirmation and without warrant in law.

NOT A CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR GENERAL.

"That is the main issue on which we differed, though always, as I supposed, without personal feeling. I have learned since that before leaving for home last March he told friends that he was going to get my removal. I think his feeling against me was increased by the fact that there was gossip of my being a candidate for Governor General. I was never in any sense, and deplored the talk of it that frequently was current in the native papers. I found it also gossip at Washington, but it was wholly untrue.

"To being an obstructionist I plead guilty as to the things I knew to be illegal. My fight against them was supported with some pretty drastic opinions, I admit. I am satisfied with the record as it stands. There will be a congressional investigation of the administration in the Philippines. I was told in Washington, just as soon as the Democrats get in full control next spring. It will be a hostile investigation, and it will bring out some sensational matter. I have done nothing to stir up the investigation, but my protest will be found on file as to all the acts I felt to be illegal or unwarranted. Much public money has been wasted or misspent. The Governor General has interfered often in the administration of justice to favor personal or political friends."

The Filipinos fully expect independence from the coming Democratic administration, Judge Elliott says. "They have every right to expect it," he declared last evening. "The Democrats have promised it in every platform, and if they do not grant it they will break their word. If it is not granted, I fear there will be trouble in the islands."

Petition of Frank B. Sanborn, Frederick Starr, and others.

To the President, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas D. C. Worcester, a member of the commission appointed for the government of the Philippine Islands, and acting as secretary of the interior of said commission, has become notoriously unpopular among the natives of the islands, the final and culminating evidence of which was given by a resolution (annexed) unanimously passed by the General Assembly of the Philippine Islands as the closing act of its last session; and

Whereas the late President McKinley proclaimed that all American officials appointed during our control of the Philippine Islands should be agreeable and acceptable to the inhabitants as a condition precedent to successful administration; and

Whereas D. C. Worcester has endeavored to bring to bear repressive measures in the United States upon the press favorable to Philippine independence similar to those exerted by him upon Manila newspapers; and said Worcester has antagonized and publicly vilified the friends of the Filipinos in the United States, the officers of the Anti-Imperialist League, and their counsel, and has provisionally threatened a Member of the House of Representatives in execution of his duty with a suit for libel similar to those with which he secured the imprisonment of a member of the assembly in the Philippine Islands: Therefore

Resolved, That you are respectfully requested at once to institute a special inquiry into the manner in which the said D. C. Worcester has discharged the duties of his office as commissioner in the Philippine Islands.

Frederick Starr, Frank B. Sanborn, E. H. Clement, Whitfield L. Tuck, John Ritchie, Walter C. Wright, Lincoln R. Stone, Lucius F. C. Garvin, B. C. Fox, W. H. Fox, John F. Jennings, Francis E. Woodruff, Robert E. Bisbee, A. A. Berle, W. H. H. Bryant, Gamaliel Bradford, Louis R. Ehrich, Oswald Garrison Villard, Louis H. Bonelli, jr., C. B. Wilby, Prescott Smith.

Resolution declaring censurable the attitude taken by the Hon. Dean C. Worcester, secretary of the interior, in his address delivered October 10, 1910, referring the facts, with the opinion of the house, to the President of the United States.

Resolved, That the regret of the assembly be recorded for the language attributed to Hon. Dean C. Worcester, secretary of the interior of the Philippine Government, in a discourse before the Young Men's Christian Association October 10, 1910.

It is improper and censurable in a man who holds a public office and who has the confidence of the Government, and as the statements made as facts are false, slanderous, and offensive to the Philippine people, their publication is a grave violation of those instructions given by President McKinley which required that public functionaries should feel and express respect for the prejudices, beliefs, and sentiments of the Philippine people and should show to them the highest consideration. The words and the conduct of Mr. Worcester tend to sow distrust between the Americans and the Filipinos, whose aspirations and duties should not separate them but unite them in the pathway which leads to the progress and emancipation of the Philippine people. The influence of Mr. Worcester has caused injury to the feelings of the Filipinos, encouraged race hatred, and tended to frustrate the work undertaken by men of real good will to win the esteem, confidence, and respect of the Philippine people for the Americans.

It is resolved besides that this house desires that these facts should be communicated to the President of the United States, through the governor of the Philippines and the Secretary of War.

This resolution was unanimously adopted by the house without discussion.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., December 9, 1912.

Hon. WILLIAM A. JONES,
Chairman Committee on Insular Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am an American citizen, but have been living in the Philippine Islands for eight years, going there in September, 1904, and returning to the United States in September of the present year.

During my entire residence in the Philippines I have been engaged in the private practice of law, with the exception of two years spent in the office of the prosecuting attorney of the judicial district of Manila. While engaged in the practice of my profession my business carried me to every section of the islands and brought me in contact with the people of all classes.

During my service as prosecuting attorney of the judicial district of Manila, containing approximately 500,000 inhabitants, the duties of my position brought me into intimate relations with many of the people of the district, including all of the native lawyers, all of the native judges, and most of the native employees of the Government.

The prosecuting attorney of the Manila judicial district acts not only as a prosecutor, but also serves in the capacity of a grand jury. He determines, from an examination of the witnesses, whether or not an indictment, or, more accurately, an information or complaint shall be presented to the court. In my opinion, this official has a better opportunity to observe the general character and intelligence of the people than any other official in the islands.

In the course of my private practice and in the discharge of my official duties I have come in contact with native lawyers of the highest talent and legal attainments; physicians and surgeons, learned and skillful in their profession; merchants who employ the latest commercial methods and observe the strictest business integrity; and people in the private walks of life of the highest intellectual attainments, educated in the best universities and colleges of Europe, speaking, in many instances, as many as five foreign languages.

From my intimate knowledge of the Filipino people, gained in the manner above stated and from my social intercourse with them, I do not hesitate to say they are capable of self-government.

If granted their independence, I believe that they will maintain a government which will be not only more satisfactory to them, but one which will more nearly meet their needs and demands than the government under which they have lived for the past 14 years or any government which could be given them in the future by the United States or any other foreign power. In saying this I am not unmindful of the great improvements which have been made in these islands since American occupation, nor do I intend to underestimate the able and faithful services rendered these people by many American officials. However, I do mean to say that the United States has maintained a government in these islands too expensive and far beyond the needs and resources of these people and, at times, extravagant and wasteful.

But, regardless of all these considerations, the people of these islands never have been and never will be satisfied to be governed by the United States or any other foreign power.

They want independence. It is the one dream and aspiration of their lives. It is the only gleam of sunshine that cheers their dark fate, the result of war, pestilence, and famine.

With a strong religious sentiment underlying the lives of these people, a virtuous womanhood from whom must spring their future citizens, a high regard for law and official authority, a fair amount of general education now, and a wonderful aptness for learning, and a patriotism which is so lofty and pathetic that it should touch the heart of every unselfish American in the islands there is no reason on earth why these people should not be granted independence.

I do not believe that any American who does not like the Filipino people is qualified to speak with any degree of impartiality regarding their capacity for self-government, and I believe the fundamental mistake into which the Republican Party has led the American people during the last 14 years has been due to the circumstances that the reports of its agents have always been tinctured with the residuum of the early hostility and a strongly acquired taste for official life in the Philippine Islands.

I am heartily in sympathy with the vital principle of your bill in that it holds out to the living among the Filipino people a reasonable hope of living to see the independence of their country. I have discussed its provisions with many intelligent Filipinos, and they were unanimous in their desire for it to become a law.

The Republican Party has always been willing to imply a promise of independence, but no Republican administration has ever been bold enough and honest enough to commit itself to the proposition that the lawmaking power of the Government, the final depository of the real authority, should formally commit itself to a definite promise of independence.

To substitute frankness in this matter, in lieu of temporizing and evasion, is the democracy's opportunity with regard to the Philippine Islands.

Very cordially, yours, L. M. SOUTHWORTH.

Letter of William T. Lyon.

GARDENS OF NAGTAJAN,
Manila, P. I., November 8, 1912.

Many Democratic Congressmen and Mr. Wilson himself are bound to be influenced by the enormous volume of evidence testifying to the disqualification of the Filipino for self-government. Every high official in the Filipino service, every white civilian employee, every military officer, every newspaper printed in English, 95 per cent of the white merchants or traders, and, worse than all, every visiting statesman will treat with scorn and ridicule the slightest intimation that now, or at any other time, these people will ever be equipped for autonomous government.

This is an overwhelming array, and it is no discredit to the sanity, wisdom, or patriotism of any Congressman, Senator, or President to say, "Why, these are the people who know; the people who live or have lived amongst them for years. They are a unit on this matter. Who am I that from a smattering of newspaper items should put my belief against such a cloud of witnesses?"

The evidence is seemingly so conclusive that the almost essential feature, its sources, are entirely overlooked. Here is the rub. Without exception this evidence is biased and prejudiced and, with the exception of the "visiting statesman," I can clearly show you how it can not be otherwise.

To first take up the case of the "visiting statesman." When Mr. Dickinson was here—Mr. Taft's first Secretary of War—it was all prearranged that he should be permitted to meet strictly two classes of people, none others. One, the very limited but thoroughly pro-American type of native who, more or less the beneficiary of American patronage, could be counted on to decry and belittle his countrymen. The other class were with equal care culled from the most ignorant and brutal of the two types that so cunning and astute a manager as Mr. Frank Carpenter could select. Throughout his itinerary, all cut and dried before his arrival, this program was adhered to. If any rank outsider who was not on the slate butted in, he was promptly ejected by the official hustler. This is the basic difficulty with which visiting statesmen or delegations have had to contend and must continue to have, for we have far too much at stake to permit an intelligent man to wander about here unchaperoned and pick up information at first-hand which might be detrimental to our ends. The more prominent the man in public life and the better known, the more impossible for him to escape our official sleuth.

I would be tempted, if I was sure of considerate reply, to urge upon President-elect Wilson the selection of some bright man who knew Spanish and was willing to acquire a bit of Tagalog to travel alone and incognito in these islands and mingle with these people for six months and without the customary accompaniments of banquets, brass bands, ovations, and orations from leading citizens. Under such conditions the visitor has less insight into the real Filipino than one who has never put foot on these islands. Under such conditions our high officials always travel. Under such conditions Mr. Taft always traveled, and he has traveled thousands of miles in this archipelago. That his ignorance is not total is due solely to a remarkable acumen and insight into character, which has counterpoised in a very small degree the vicious influence of travel under such conditions.

The other classes are more summarily disposed of. We Americans hold all the offices there are which are worth while except some of the judgeships. As long as we continue to want the salaries of those positions, so long are we going to be a unit in declaring that the Filipinos are disqualified to hold them. Nor is a change of politics going to cause any change of heart. Although a Democrat myself, I am quite well assured there will be no lack of Democrats who are patriots for revenue, who, if they succeed to these positions now filled by Republicans, will just as quickly discover the unfitness of the native to hold any good-salaried job.

There are 167 high-salaried positions of which about 150 are held by Americans. We are guilty of a lot of tommy rot about "training up the natives to holding these positions," and we have no intention of letting them progress further than to be porters or messenger boys. That a number of high-salaried Filipinos are judges is to our shame, not to our credit. We could not help it. Mr. Taft declared that the collective intelligence, probity, and legal knowledge of the American bar in Manila fell short of the best judicial standards. He had to appoint Filipinos. A single instance will illustrate the status of every American officeholder in the Philippine Islands.

Both the civil and military governments are buyers of enormous quantities of supplies. They now favor American tradesmen, a patronage which would naturally revert to Filipino dealers upon a change of governmental policy. The daily (American) newspapers are, of course, the most virulent advocates of the "uplift" rot. Given to them the loss of the government and of their commercial advertising and they could not live a week. They—newspapers and merchants—are strenuous and united in urging the ingress of American capital. Every dollar of American capital planted in their country cements by a new tie the continuity of present relations. These benighted "savages," so unfit for self-government, have the perspicacity of vision and acumen to grasp this fact and oppose it bitterly.

The newspapers use this as an argument to show that these people have not intelligence enough to grasp the fact that outside capital brings prosperity to a people, ergo, they have not sense enough to govern themselves. The military are no whit behind. They like their tour of duty. They are at less living expense, their travel back and forth is free, and their pay automatically goes up 10 per cent during their detail to the Philippines. In short, we, about all of us, have an ax to grind. Even I am not quite fit to cast the first stone. I have resided here for 11 years because I love the Tropics, and my occupations has given me opportunity to explore this great country from the Batanes to the Sulu Archipelago, and I am sometimes inclined to question if my sense of personal security would be quite as great under a native régime.

At the same time I feel I have no right whatsoever to let my selfish inclinations weigh for an instant against my country's unquestionable duty to give these people the bread (independence) and not the stone ("uplift") with which we attempt to fool them. When I said above, "my personal security," I rather meant to include my countrymen at large, upon whom reprisals might be made for having spoiled the Egyptians. As an individual, I am persona grata to my neighbors, and would feel more secure here at any time than on the streets of Boston.

Having no copyright upon your reserved powers of endurance, I will close.

Very truly, WM. S. LYON.

P. S.—As an afterthought, and which should have been embodied in my communication, I would call attention to the hollowness and insincerity of any pretense of ours that we mean to ever get out of the Philippine Islands. At this moment the Philippine Assembly is besieged on every side with an attempt to load ourselves upon them in perpetuity with a service pension bill. Not only is every official from the Governor General down lobbying for it, but even the Philippine judges, whose influence is great, are making the same fight. Realizing that their pro-American tendencies would, under native rule, relegate them to private life, they are making hay while the sun shines to get securely landed on the pension roll for life, after a State service of 12 to 15 years. Such being the insolence of Mr. Forbes's and Mr. Worcester's demands. There is enough intelligence in the assembly to realize the nature of this assault upon their pockets. They know that under no circumstances will the United States grant them autonomy except upon their solemn obligation to sacredly observe all their laws affecting citizens of the United States, and they realize the iniquity of being forced to accep this life-everlasting burden.

But forced they are in danger of being. The American commissioners have now an outrageous bill of this nature to hand the assembly. The ultimatum will be, pass it or we will veto your most cherished legislation. Then publish you to the world as obstructionists incapable of self-government. Between the devil and the deep sea, and rather than be branded with so undeserved a stigma, there is a chance that they will be coerced into swallowing this bitter pill. Once give us a life grip upon all the good salaries there are, and we will give these people all the independence they ask for.

L.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. I will if I have the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has about four minutes remaining.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman refers to the Filipino people. Whom does he mean by "Filipino people"?

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman that when we speak generally of the Filipinos we mean all the people, Christian as well as non-Christian, civilized as well as uncivilized; but usually when I speak of the Filipinos I mean the 7,600,000 Christianized, civilized Filipinos. I exclude the Igorots and I exclude the Moros, who are reported to be fighting the United States forces in Jolo at this time. They constitute some 600,000 people. I do not speak of them as Filipinos any more than I would speak of the Indian tribes of America as "Americans" when I speak of Americans.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BATES. If a foundling were left upon the gentleman's doorstep, I am sure his generous and humanitarian feelings would permit him to take it in and care for it. After having done so, should he find that on account of the increased cost of living it was becoming expensive to care for the foundling, would he throw it into the street?

Mr. JONES. My reply to the gentleman is that the Philippines were not left on the doorstep of the United States. The Filipinos had captured every Spanish post in the Philippine Islands—had captured their crack regiment, every position with the sole exception of Manila, and had we left the Filipinos alone they would have secured their independence within a few months from the time the Spanish fleet was destroyed. [Applause.]

Mr. BATES. One other question. Would they have been in as good a state of civilization as they are to-day if that had happened?

Mr. JONES. Well, I think they would. But of course that is a question that neither the gentleman nor I can answer with absolute certainty.

Mr. BATES. Would they have had American school teachers, for instance?

Mr. SAUNDERS. How far is it where they are fighting at Mindanao to the place where Aguinaldo is?

Mr. JONES. It is some 1,000 miles by water to where the fighting is going on. I wish to say that Aguinaldo, who is charged by these Manila correspondents with inciting the trouble down in Jolo, was never in Jolo in his life. He does not speak the language which is spoken there, and he would not, if he was there, understand a word that was said. Indeed, the constabulary and scouts that are reported to be engaged in fighting the Moros are Filipinos. Aguinaldo's sympathies are not likely to be with the Moros as against his own people. The troops that are endeavoring to put down the Moro revolt that Aguinaldo is falsely accused of inciting are Filipino troops.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that a nation, any more than a man, can live by bread alone. And I do not believe that the policy of the American people touching the Philippine Islands can be determined by any summing up of a financial statement of receipts and expenditures. [Applause.]

With much of what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] has said I am in accord, though had I had the information that he states he has touching the conduct of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, I would have felt it my duty as a representative of the people of America to stand upon this floor and ask his impeachmnt. If I believed—and I neither believe nor disbelieve, because I have not the information—that the statements which he has made are accurate, touching the Governor General, then I should feel that he ought to be removed from office because of malfeasance in office.

I also am prepared to admit that we have spent vast sums in the past and are spending large sums now in connection with the Philippines; that they ever will be profitable in a dollar-and-cents way to the people of America I gravely doubt. I for one have never believed it. I also, claiming to be a Democrat, am desirous of the day when we can give to the Filipinos an independence that will mean something to them; that will be a real independence; that will carry to them real liberty of every sort and kind; but I am unwilling now to undertake to prophesy as to the future. I have never seen any wisdom in legislatively determining that a certain fact will happen upon a given date in the future, whether it does or not. My party stands committed, and properly stands committed, to the proposition that whenever the Filipino people are capable of maintaining a stable Government they should be given their independence. Upon that I stand with my party.

But I am not prepared to say that on the Fourth of July of any given year in the future that condition will have arrived; and not being able to span the future with the flimsy bridge of thought, I am unwilling to say legislatively that upon such a day, at such an hour, their independence should be given them.

This I believe to be the sacred duty of any party in power—to so conduct the affairs of the Philippine people as to cause them to make as rapid progress as is possible toward self-government. To them we owe "honor and faith and a sure intent." We have no right to, we dare not, exploit the Philippines; but I am unwilling to accept, as the voice of the Filipino people, the voice of a limited number of officeholders in the Philippine Islands, whether they be Americans or Filipinos. [Applause.] I am unwilling to accept Manila as the judgment of the Philippines.

I have not a very elaborate acquaintanceship with those islands. My personal contact with them amounted to the same as that of the gentleman who is chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs. We both visited those islands for a limited length of time. Men get various impressions from what they see. I realize that with a very small percentage of the people of those islands able to talk to each other in any common tongue, it is a rather difficult proposition to arrive at what the islands as a whole desire by the expression of a limited number of people in Manila or here. I know of nothing that is of such tremendous value to the Filipino people as a whole as the fact that the people of America are aiding them, through the common schools there, to come to the use of a common tongue, that there may be an exchange of ideas and of wishes among the various peoples of those islands. Few realize how widely different in habits, in customs, in feelings, the various sections of the Philippines are.

The gentleman from Virginia says that when he usually speaks of the Philippines he speaks for the Christian Filipinos, and he does not usually have in mind, in speaking of them, the Moros, those who inhabit the lower part of the archipelago. And yet they constitute no inconsiderable part in numbers, and they constitute no inconsiderable force in fighting power; and when you come to determine the peace of those islands when we shall withdraw from them, you have to consider—aye, to consider on behalf of the Christian Filipinos—what the effect may be upon the non-Christian Filipino tribes.

I hope that every charge that has been made by the gentleman from Virginia will be investigated, and I hope, if any of them are true—and I again say I express no opinion, because I have not the facts upon which to base an opinion—that every man guilty of a violation of his trust there shall be severely punished. I would spare no one, because, I say again, the very test of American civilization will come in our dealings with the Filipino people, and we dare not stoop to anything beneath the very highest ideals of the English-speaking race. But I am not prepared to agree to the proposition that in our occupancy of the Philippine Islands we have been a detriment and a hurt to the Filipino people.

I shall not here attempt a summary of what has been done or what has been left undone, but I believe that no man can make an impartial study of our actions in those islands without coming to the conclusion, when you weigh the good with the bad, that our occupancy has been beneficial. It is no slight task. I know the danger that comes from undertaking to govern another people. The idea in its abstract statement is abhorrent to my nature. And yet I realize, whether wisely or unwisely, there came from the signing of the treaty of peace with Spain certain responsibilities upon the people of America, and those responsibilities they can not shirk, and they will not shirk. [Applause.]

If in the carrying out of those obligations there have been done those things that should not have been done, let the punishment be swift and sure. Let those of us that now assume the responsibilities of government see to it that no indictment, such as that which the gentleman from Virginia has brought against the existing administration, can be brought against us; but let us not undertake to determine in advance the happening of events that only time itself can determine. Let not men, out of a false idea, and by what I believe to be not the voice of the Philippine people as a whole, determine this question.

It is because of this, that I did not want to let go unchallenged what seemed to be the conclusion of the gentleman from Virginia touching the duty of gentlemen on this side of the Chamber and touching the probable policy of the incoming administration. In what I have said I speak only for myself, as I only have the right to speak; but I believe that I also voice somewhat the thought, somewhat the belief, and somewhat the aspirations of the people of America. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. GOOD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, a moment ago the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] said that he did not refer to the Igorots when he spoke of the Filipino people. The Igorots are the wild mountain tribes that inhabit northern Luzon. The Tagalogs, many of whom clamor for independence, live in and about Manila. They fear and dread these wild pagan mountaineers even as the Spaniards feared and dreaded them during the days of Spanish occupancy. The native governor of a Province just on the border of the territory where these Igorots live—the Christian governor, if you please—made the remarkable statement that in his judgment the best thing to do with these wild Igorots is to kill them all. That was his idea of how they ought to be treated. Now, I am opposed to giving independence, or to saying when we shall give independence, to a people who have yet, evidently, to learn the true meaning of independence.

Mr. QUEZON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from the Philippine Islands?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. QUEZON. While I do not question the accuracy of the statement made by the gentleman that the governor of a Province south of the territory inhabited by the Igorots said that the best Igorot is a dead Igorot, yet I should like to ask the gentleman if he has not heard a similar expression in the United States, and I will ask him if he thinks the American people should be charged with the fact that somebody has made that statement.

Mr. KAHN. I suppose the gentleman refers to a statement attributed to an Army officer, who said that the only good Indian is a dead Indian, but the cases are not at all parallel. Here is the governor of a Province, the official charged with the execution and enforcement of the laws of that Province—the man whose duty it is, above all others, to maintain law and order. Yet he, forsooth, would kill off the people who are immediately to the north of him, who are not Christians, because he does not believe they have the right to live.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I think what the gentleman says is perfectly true about the disposition of the Moros, that they would kill the Christian Filipinos. I think that statement is perfectly true. But how does that comport with the report from Manila published all over the country yesterday that Aguinaldo, a southern Tagalog resident of Cavite Province, has been down there inciting those people, who would kill him, to rebellion against the United States Government?

Mr. KAHN. I did not see any article in any newspaper which indicated that Aguinaldo was in the Moro country inciting those people. I did see some statement to the effect that he was inciting them, but I saw no reference anywhere to his personal presence in the Moro country. But I did not intend to discuss the Philippine question at this time.

I desire to address myself more particularly to the question of the reorganization of the Army. During the discussion a few days ago on the Army appropriation bill the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] stated that annually on this floor a statement is made that the War Department is making an effort to reorganize the Army, and then as soon as the Army appropriation is out of the way the matter is dropped for an entire year, only to be resurrected upon the consideration of the next military supply bill. I wish to state to the House that the War Department has perfected a plan for the reorganization of the Army. Although the matter was taken up actively only about a year ago, the department is now putting that plan into actual operation in the Middle West. It has formulated a full report on the reorganization of the land forces of the United States, and I ask unanimous consent to insert that report in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting the document referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The document referred to is as follows:

REPORT ON THE ORGANIZATION OF THE LAND FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

SYNOPSIS.

I. General relations between the land and naval forces.
II. Relations between the land forces at home and abroad.
  1. The detachments on foreign service.
    Philippines.
    Oahu.
    Panama.
    Guantanamo.
    Alaska.
    Porto Rico.
  2. Summary of advantages to be derived from a separate organization of the detachments on foreign service.
III. The land forces within the territorial limits of the United States.
  1. The traditional military policy of the United States.
  2. The time required to raise armies.
  3. Two classes of citizen soldiers, organized and unorganized.

I.

General relations between the land and naval forces.

A general consideration of our responsibilities and our geographical position indicates that the maintenance of our policies and interests at home and abroad demand an adequate fleet and a well-organized and sufficient army. The function of the Navy is to secure and maintain the command of the sea. To accomplish this it must be free to seek and defeat the enemy. The use of any part of the fleet for local defense therefore defeats the chief object of naval power. The principal rôle of the Navy is offensive and the requirements of local defense must be met by other means. A fleet unsupported by an army is unable to secure the fruits of naval victory; a fleet defeated at sea is powerless to prevent invasion. The solution of the problem of national defense lies, therefore, in the provision of suitable land and sea forces and a due recognition of their coordinate relations.

II.

Relations between the land forces at home and abroad.

Any plan for the organization of the land forces of the United States should be based upon a recognition of the fact that these forces are and must be divided into two distinct parts:

1. The Army on service beyond the territorial limits of the United States.

2. The Army within the territorial limits of the United States.

The Army on detached service beyond the territorial limits of the United States consists of the detachments required to meet the special military problems of the Philippines, Panama, Oahu, Alaska, Guantanamo, and Porto Rico. Each of these detachments has a distinct tactical and strategic mission and is to operate within a restricted terrain. All of them depend upon over-seas communication with the home country, and all of them may therefore be isolated for considerable periods, especially in the critical first stages of war. It is obvious that under these circumstances these detachments should be prepared to meet all military emergencies until reenforcements from the United States can reasonably be expected. They must therefore be organized with the view to being self-supporting until the Navy has accomplished its primary mission of securing the command of the sea.

The Army within the territorial limits of the United States is on an entirely different basis. It may or may not be given an adequate strength in time of peace, but it is supported by all of the resources of the Nation. It may be increased at the pleasure of Congress, and it may be reenforced by considerable forces of citizen soldiery. It follows from these considerations that the military establishment of the United States in time of peace should first provide effective and sufficient garrisons for the political and strategic outposts of the United States and that the residue at home should be organized with the view to ultimate expansion into such war forces as national interests may require. The essential difference between the forces at home and the forces abroad is thus seen to be that they have different capacities with reference to expansion at the outbreak of war. The Army at home is expansible to the highest degree, while the detachments abroad are not expansible at all in the brief but critical period that marks the first stage of modern war.

1. THE DETACHMENTS ON FOREIGN SERVICE.

The minimum garrisons required for the maintenance of national interests beyond the limits of the United States are as follows:

The Philippines.—Four regiments of Infantry at maximum statutory strength (150 men per company), 2 regiments of Cavalry at maximum statutory strength (100 men per troop), 2 battalions of Field and Mountain Artillery (6 batteries), 2 companies of Engineers, 2 companies of Signal troops (one of these a field company), 24 companies of Coast Artillery, 52 companies of Philippine Scouts, 1 ambulance company, 1 field hospital, with detachments pertaining to the Ordnance Department and enlisted men of the Hospital Corps on duty with organizations.

It is the duty of this force to support the authority of the United States throughout the archipelago, and in war it must be prepared to hold the defenses of Manila Bay at all costs until our fleet is free to operate in eastern waters. The garrison of mobile troops proposed for the Philippines comprises substantially the same enlisted strength as has been included in the garrison maintained there for the past few years. It is proposed to increase its economy and effectiveness by concentrating the bulk of this garrison in the vicinity of Manila. It is also proposed to maintain organizations permanently or for long periods in the Philippines, thus avoiding the waste of money and loss of efficiency due to frequent changes of station between the islands and the United States. Until recently entire organizations have been shifted; under the new policy the personnel will gradually be changed as enlistments expire or as the officers complete their allotted tours, but the organizations will remain where they can prepare and train for their peculiar functions in peace and war. The expense of this garrison has further been reduced by replacing 12 regiments of Infantry and Cavalry at reduced strength by 6 regiments of Infantry and Cavalry at the maximum strength authorized by law. This materially reduces the per capita cost of the Philippines garrison and permits the withdrawal of six regiments for use at home or in the other foreign garrisons.

Oahu.—The maintenance of this naval base is essential to the defense of our Pacific coast and to securing the full military value of the Panama Canal as a strategic highway between the two oceans. Pearl Harbor will be covered by seacoast fortifications, which are now nearing completion; but as the coast defenses of Pearl Harbor will be unable to prevent hostile landings on the 100 miles of coast which lie beyond the range of their guns, the security of the island and of the naval base ultimately depends upon maintaining a mobile force sufficient to defeat such hostile forces as may succeed in landing at any place on the island. Under conditions of modern warfare we can not count with certainty upon reenforcing the peace garrison of the island after a declaration of war or while war is imminent. The security of our naval base in the Pacific, therefore, demands that the garrison of Oahu must be able to hold out at all hazards until our fleet can arrive in Hawaiian waters. This may be taken as 40 days, assuming that the fleet is not employed on another mission and that the Panama Canal is open to its use.

The minimum peace garrison of Oahu is, therefore, placed as follows: Six regiments of Infantry at maximum statutory strength (150 men per company), 1 regiment of Cavalry at maximum statutory strength (100 men per troop), 3 battalions of Field Artillery (9 batteries), 1 company of Engineers, 1 field company of Signal troops, 10 companies of Coast Artillery, 1 ambulance company, 1 field hospital.

Plans are being made for the expansion of the Hawaiian National Guard and the organization of volunteers from the American population. But the foundation of the defense must rest upon trained regulars who are familiar with the complicated terrain of the island. Our naval base in the Pacific will never be attacked except by troops of the highest skill and training and the attack will be made before extemporized troops can be prepared or hardened for full military effectiveness.

Panama.—Upon its completion the Panama Canal will be our most important strategic position. By our control of this highway between the two oceans the effectiveness of our fleet and our general military power will be enormously increased. It is therefore obvious that the unquestioned security of the canal is our most important military problem. The permanent garrison must be strong enough to guard the locks and other important works and to prevent a naval attack which under modern conditions may even precede a declaration of war. We must therefore be able, even in peace, to man the seacoast guns that cover the approach to the canal, and we must have enough mobile troops to protect the rear of the forts and to defeat naval raids. A modern fleet can land a raiding party of several thousand bluejackets, and such a force landing out of range of the seacoast guns could penetrate to some vulnerable part of the canal within a few hours. The permanent garrison must therefore include a mobile force strong enough to anticipate and defeat naval raids at the beginning of hostilities and to secure the canal until reenforcements can be expected from the United States.

The minimum peace garrison necessary for the defense of the canal is as follows: Three regiments of Infantry at the maximum strength recommended in Chapter VI of this report, 1 battalion of Field Artillery (3 batteries), 1 squadron of Cavalry, 1 Signal company, 1 Engineer company, 1 ambulance company, 1 field hospital, and 18 companies of Coast Artillery.

By treaty with the Republic of Panama this garrison should be given facilities in time of peace to operate beyond the Canal Zone, in order that the troops may be properly trained for their special mission and be made familiar with the terrain over which they may be called upon to operate in defending the canal.

Guantanamo.—The policy of the United States contemplates the establishment of a naval base at Guantanamo. It is most necessary that the garrisons of Coast Artillery and mobile troops necessary for its land defense should be determined with the least possible delay.

Alaska.—The present garrison of Alaska comprises one regiment of Infantry and two companies of Signal troops. As troops can be withdrawn from Alaska only during a part of the year, this garrison can not be included among the troops available for general military purposes. The assignment of one Infantry regiment as the garrison for Alaska is not with any idea of the defense of the Territory in the event of war, but simply to furnish a police force to quell local disorders.

With the settled conditions that now obtain in the government of Alaska it is believed that the time has come to relieve the Army from this police duty and that a force of constabulary should be organized and charged with the police of the Territory. The two companies of the Signal Corps should also be withdrawn and the lines turned over to the proper civil authorities.

Porto Rico.—The garrison of this island is the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry, comprising two battalions, or eight companies. Its enlisted men are native Porto Ricans. Its field officers are detailed from the United States Army, and its captains and lieutenants, some of whom are Porto Ricans, are specially commissioned for this regiment. This regiment might serve outside of Porto Rico under certain contingencies, but it can not be considered as available for general military purposes.

It is recommended that this regiment be completed so as to conform in organization to the Infantry regiment recommended in this report and that promotion to the grade of major be authorized for the permanent officers of the regiment.

Passing through this regiment each year are a number of trained men. It is recommended that two regiments of National Guard be organized in Porto Rico, which, with the regular regiment, would form a brigade. The detailed colonel of the regular regiment should also be given the militia rank as brigadier general and be charged, under direction of the governor, with the administration and training of the National Guard of Porto Rico and with the command of the brigade whenever it operates as such.

The following table gives a summary of the minimum forces required for the maintenance of national interest in the outlying possessions of the United States:

	Philippines.	Oahu.	Panama.	Alaska.	Porto Rico.	Total for foreign service.
Regiments of Infantry	4	6	3	1	.....	14
Regiments of Cavalry	2	1	½	.....	.....	3½

2. SUMMARY OF ADVANTAGES TO BE DERIVED FROM A SEPARATE ORGANIZATION OF THE DETACHMENTS ON FOREIGN SERVICE.

The following advantages will result from the organization of the foreign garrisons as distinct and separate parts of the military establishment:

1. Simplification of the problems of training and administration.—Until recently the organizations have been shifted back and forth between home and foreign service. There has been in consequence a constant change of function and an incomplete or imperfect adaptation of the shifting units to either function.

2. Simplification of problems of organization.—Under the old system, although there were distinct kinds of service and an actual separation of the Army into parts, yet the difference of function of these parts has not been recognized as the basis of organization. The Army has been treated as a homogeneous whole, with the same organization at home and abroad. Regiments that have been maintained at low strength at home on the theory of expansibility have been maintained at the same strength on foreign service, where expansion of any kind is impracticable.

3. Greater economy.—Keeping war strength units permanently on foreign service will reduce the per capita cost of the foreign garrisons. The reduction in cost for any given foreign garrison is due chiefly to the following causes:

(a) Economies due to the maintenance of permanent organizations on foreign service.—This necessarily results in reduced expenditure for transportation. With permanent regiments the transportation is limited to that required to maintain the desired strength; that is, the transportation of officers and enlisted men who return to the United States on account of disability or upon discharge, or upon the completion of the allotted time of foreign service, and the transportation of the officers and men who are sent out to fill vacancies. With shifting regiments, in addition to the above-described maintenance travel, entire organizations with all personnel and impedimenta must be transported at stated intervals.

(b) Economies due to increased enlisted strength in existing organizations.—This necessarily results in greatly reduced cost per effective combatant soldier. If 900 enlisted men be formed into a new regiment the pay and allowances of additional officers and high-priced noncommissioned officers must be considered. But if the same number of men be added to organizations already in existence there is no appreciable increase in overhead or administrative expenses, and it is only necessary to estimate for the pay and allowances of the privates added. In any given garrison the cost of barracks and quarters is determined largely by the number of companies. The per capita cost for housing is therefore a minimum when the enlisted strength per company is a maximum.

It is calculated that the annual cost of the proposed garrisons of the Philippines, Oahu, and Panama on the permanent war strength basis will be upward of $4,000,000 per year less than the cost of garrisons of the same strength maintained under the old system of shifting low-strength regiments. Barracks and quarters for the proposed garrisons will cost at least $6,000,000 less than barracks and quarters for the same enlisted strength organized as at present.

4. Localization of regiments at home.—As soon as we discontinue the transfer of organizations to and from foreign service we may localize the Army at home. This will result in further economies and in increased effectiveness. Problems of recruitment will be simplified and plans for the expansion of the home army into an effective war force will become more definite. The important problems involving the relations of the Regular Army to the citizen soldiery may be worked out on a more definite basis and will receive more intelligent attention when the functions and duties of the home army are recognized as distinct from those of the detachments abroad. While serving abroad the war preparation of officers and men will be for the defense of an important but restricted local terrain. While serving at home the war preparation of officers and men will be for general military service.

5. As problems of administration will be simplified, so will problems of executive policy and legislation. With the Army organized in distinct units, each with definite functions, it will be easier for Congress to determine the real military needs of the Nation. The complex problem of national defense will be simplified by a resolution into several distinct and separate problems, each to be met by a separate and distinct military organization.

III.

The land forces within the territorial limits of the United States.

1. THE TRADITIONAL MILITARY POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES.

The problem of military organization has two aspects, a dynamic aspect and a political aspect. The measure of military force required to meet any given emergency is purely dynamic, while the form of military institutions must be determined on political grounds, with due regard to national genius and tradition. There can be no sound solution of the problem if either of these fundamental aspects be ignored. The military pedant may fail by proposing adequate and economical forces under forms that are intolerable to the national genius, while the political pedant may propose military systems which lack nothing except the necessary element of trained and disciplined military force. The practical military statesman must recognize both of these elements of the problem. He does not propose impracticable or foreign institutions, but seeks to develop the necessary vigor and energy within the familiar institutions that have grown with the national life. But the ultimate test is dynamic. In any military system the final test is capacity to exert superior military force in time to meet any given national emergency.

It is the traditional policy of the United States that the military establishment in time of peace is to be a small Regular Army and that the ultimate war force of the Nation is to be a great army of citizen soldiers. This fundamental theory of military organization is sound economically and politically. The maintenance of armies in time of peace imposes a heavy financial burden on the Nation, and the expenditure for this purpose should be kept at a minimum consistent with effectiveness for war. But reliance upon citizen soldiers is subject to the limitation that they can not be expected to meet a trained enemy until they, too, have been trained. Our history is full of the success of the volunteer soldier after he has been trained for war, but it contains no record of the successful employment of raw levies for general military purposes.

It is therefore our most important military problem to devise means for preparing great armies of citizen soldiers to meet the emergency of modern war. The organization of the Regular Army is but a smaller phase of this problem. It is simply the peace nucleus of the greater war army, and its strength and organization should always be considered with reference to its relation to the greater war force which can not be placed in the field until war is imminent. The problem is one of expansion from a small peace force to a great war force. Its solution therefore involves the provision of a sufficient peace nucleus, the partial organization and training of citizen soldiers in peace, and provisions for prompt and orderly expansion on the outbreak of war.

But the practical solution of the problem can not be met by the promulgation of a general theory. The Army at any time and place must be strong enough to defeat any enemy that may oppose it at that time and place. We are concerned more with the time required to raise the force of trained troops than with their ultimate numbers. If we need 60,000 soldiers in a given terrain within 30 days and can only deploy 50,000 soldiers in that time and place, we are not prepared for the emergency, even if our plans provide for ten times that number at some period in the future. Whatever our military institutions may be, we must recognize the fundamental facts that victory is the reward of superior force, that modern wars are short and decisive, and that trained armies alone can defeat trained armies.

2. THE TIME REQUIRED TO RAISE ARMIES.

The time required for the training of extemporized armies depends largely on the presence or absence of trained instructors. If there be a corps of trained officers and noncommissioned officers and a tested organization of higher units with trained leaders and staff officers, the problem of training is limited to the training of the private soldier. This can be accomplished in a relatively short time, and under such conditions if arms and equipment are available a respectable army can be formed within six months. But where the leaders themselves are untrained and where officers and men must alike stumble toward efficiency without intelligent guidance, the formation of an efficient army is a question of years. Indeed, such a force can not become an army at all within the period of duration of modern war. As the American War of 1861–1865 presents the singular phenomenon of two extemporized armies gradually developing while in conflict with each other, it is a most remarkable record of the evolution of such forces. In the conflicts of 1861 both officers and men were untrained for the duties demanded of them. Even the companies were imperfectly organized as units of the regiment, and the lack of cohesion was still more apparent in the higher units. Bull Run disorganized both armies. One was demoralized by defeat and the other by victory. By 1862 effective regiments, brigades, and divisions had come into being, but the conduct and leading of higher units as a rule was still imperfect. It was not until 1863 that the armies confronted each other as complete and effective military teams. But even in the early stages of the war the influence of trained and able leaders was apparent. The time required to make an effective soldier depends very largely on the organization in which the recruit is enrolled. The recruit of 1861 could not become a good private until his captain became a good captain, but the recruit of 1863 was absorbed in a team already trained, and therefore became a trained soldier in a few months of active service. But while the history of the Civil War is instructive as a record of military evolution it can not be invoked as a guide of military policy, for we can count upon it that in our career as a world power no serious competitor will ever oppose us with extemporized armies.

In view of these considerations it is obvious that the citizen soldier must have some training in peace if he is to be effective in the sudden crisis of modern war. The organization in which he is to serve must exist and function in time of peace, and in view of the limited time available for training it should be a fundamental principle of American policy that no officer should be intrusted with the leadership of American soldiers who has not prepared himself for that responsibility in time of peace. The American soldier, whether regular or volunteer, is entitled to trained leadership in war.

It will never be possible for citizen soldiers to acquire thorough military training and experience in time of peace. Their training and hardening must be completed after mobilization, but the period required for such final training will be reduced exactly in proportion to the amount of training already received in time of peace. If the total peace training of a National Guard company is equivalent to two months in the field, it will be available for duty at the front two months earlier than a company of raw men, assuming other conditions equal in each case. But in any event during the period of final training, which will vary for different companies and regiments, the Regular Army must meet the situation at the front. If our citizen soldiery is put on a proper basis as to organization and training—a basis on which it does not now rest—its regiments will soon reenforce the line. Even with their limited peace training they will soon be effective for defense, and after a short period of field practice the best-officered organizations will begin to expand the Army for general military purposes.

3. TWO CLASSES OF CITIZEN SOLDIERY, ORGANIZED AND UNORGANIZED.

The traditional army of citizen soldiery should be considered as divided into two distinct classes, as follows:

1. The organized citizen soldiery, comprising those who are enrolled in definite military organizations and are partially trained in peace. This force is now known as the National Guard, and is organized under the militia clause of the Constitution.

2. The unorganized citizen soldiery. Included in this class is the Reserve Militia, which is made up of all the able-bodied citizens liable for militia duty, but who are not enrolled as members of the National Guard.

In the past the citizens liable for military duty have served the Federal Government under three distinct conditions: First, by being enrolled into a militia regiment which had been or was to be mustered into the service of the United States; second, by being enrolled into a State volunteer regiment; third, by being enrolled into a United States volunteer regiment.

For the purpose of the present discussion the term "National Guard" will be applied to the citizen soldiery which is actually organized in time of peace, whether as a State force or a National force, and the term "Volunteers" to the additional citizen soldiery which will be organized upon the imminence of war. The defects of the National Guard system, as now organized under the militia clause of the Constitution, will be considered in Chapter IX of this report. For the present the term "National Guard" will be applied for convenience to the organized citizen soldiery without reference to its legal status.

As the trained armies of modern nations will seek a decision in the early stages of war, and as extemporized armies will rarely be fit for use within the brief duration of such a conflict, it is obvious that our military policy should aim at increasing the peace strength and efficiency of the organized citizen soldiery. Provisions should be made for the organization of such new volunteer units as may be necessary on the outbreak of war, but it should always be the goal of sound policy to form the proper units in peace so that the war contingent of raw recruits can be absorbed into trained teams already in existence. This policy must be based upon the principle that a nation's military power is to be measured not by the total number of its male citizens capable of bearing arms, but by the number of trained soldiers with which it can meet a given emergency.

4. RELATION OF THE REGULAR ARMY TO THE NATION'S WAR POWER.

From a general consideration of our institutions and the requirements of modern war, it thus appears that the Regular Army is simply the peace nucleus of the greater war army of the Nation. Its strength and organization should therefore be determined by its relation to the larger force. It must form a definite model for the organization and expansion of the great war army, and it must also be prepared to meet sudden and special emergencies which can not be met by the army of citizen soldiery. Some of the special functions of the Regular Army are indicated below:

1. The peace garrisons of the foreign possessions of the United States must be detachments of the Regular Army.

2. The peace garrisons of our fortified harbors and naval bases with a sufficient nucleus of the mobile army elements of coast defense must be regular troops, definitely organized in time of peace.

3. The peace establishment of the Regular Army must be sufficient to prevent naval raids which under modern conditions may precede a declaration of war. A successful raid of this character may determine the initiative by giving the enemy a convenient base for future operations.

4. The Regular Army must form a mobile reserve prepared to reenforce the foreign garrisons during periods of insurrection and disorder.

5. The Regular Army must be prepared to furnish expeditionary forces for minor wars or for the occupation of foreign territory where treaty rights or fundamental national policies are threatened.

6. The Regular Army must be prepared to cooperate with the Navy in the formation of joint expeditions in support of the foreign interests of the United States and for the protection of American citizens abroad.

7. At the outbreak of war regular forces should be concentrated and ready to seize opportunities for important initial successes. Such opportunities will frequently be offered before the mobilization of the army of citizen soldiers can be completed.

8. At the outbreak of war special regular detachments should be ready to seize important strategic positions before they can be occupied or adequately defended by the enemy and before the concentration of the army of citizen soldiers is complete. Initial operations of this kind, such as seizing the crossings of a river frontier or a port of embarkation, frequently determine the future conduct of war and assure an early decision. Capacity to take the initiative with an effective force is the best preventive of war.

9. By its definite organization in peace the Regular Army becomes the nucleus of the greater war army. By its peace practice, its varied experience on foreign service, and its participation in expeditions the Regular Army becomes the experimental model of the volunteer army. It solves practical problems of equipment, armament, and supply, and makes its technical experience in these matters available for the larger force which is normally absorbed in peaceful occupations. It makes our war problem one of definite and orderly expansion instead of the vastly more difficult problem of extemporization.

10. The Regular Army will furnish a school of military theory and practice and will develop officers with special equipment and training for the higher staff duties in war.

11. Through its professional schools and General Staff the Regular Army will develop the unified military doctrine and policy which must permeate the entire National Army if it is to succeed in war.

12. Through its administrative and supply departments the Regular Army in peace will prepare in advance for the equipment, transportation, and supply of the great war army of the Nation.

5. EMPLOYMENT OF REGULARS AND CITIZEN SOLDIERS IN GREAT BRITAIN.

The land forces of Great Britain have been completely reorganized as a result of the experience of the Boer War. As the English system is based on the same principle of voluntary service as our own, and as her military establishment comprises a regular army for expeditionary purposes and a home defense army of citizen soldiery, it may be interesting to observe her solution of the problem of the mutual relations of the two forces. The British Army comprises the army in India and the colonies and the army at home. The latter is divided into the expeditionary force composed of regulars, and the territorial army composed of citizen soldiers. Both forces have appropriate reserves designed to raise their peace establishments to war strength and to replace wastage at the outbreak of war.

The expeditionary force comprises 6 infantry divisions and 4 cavalry brigades. Its function is to furnish immediate reenforcement to any of the foreign garrisons, to form expeditions in the conduct of small wars, and, at the outbreak of a great war, to form the strategic striking force by means of which Great Britain will profit by her naval command of the sea. The territorial army is composed of 14 infantry divisions and 14 cavalry brigades. It is composed entirely of citizen soldiers who enlist for four years and who have about the same amount of annual training as the best of our National Guard organizations.

Each division of either force comprises about 12,000 infantry with from 54 to 70 guns, about 320 divisional cavalry, with engineers, sanitary units, and other special troops. Each cavalry brigade comprises about 1,500 sabers.

The territorial army is definitely organized in division districts, and each of these districts contains an infantry division and a cavalry brigade. The men of the expeditionary force and their reserves are subject to service at any place where it may be necessary to send them in war. The divisions of the territorial army are primarily for home defense, and can not be ordered out of the United Kingdom, though individual officers and men and particular organizations may volunteer for active service abroad. In this respect the mission of the British territorial army is more restricted than that of our citizen soldiery. The general limitation of the territorial army to home defense is possible because the United Kingdom has no land frontiers. The strategic position of the United States is different in this respect. Our citizen soldiery must be ready to expand the war army for offensive operations especially if an enemy should threaten us from either of our land frontiers.

The British territorial army is to be called out at the outbreak of war, and through the preponderance of the British fleet it is expected that the force will have time to complete its training in the interval between mobilization and actual contact with the enemy. It will be ready for defensive operations almost immediately, and it is estimated by the army authorities that it will be effective for general military purposes in about six months after mobilization. The officers of the territorial army, like the enlisted men, are citizen soldiers. Each regiment and artillery brigade, however, has a permanent routine staff, consisting of an officer and instructor sergeants detailed from the regular forces. Each division district is commanded and inspected by a general officer and staff of two officers from the regular establishment. The permanent divisional staff keeps in touch with the progress of imperial war plans and is prepared at any moment to mobilize the division and place it in its allotted position in any particular military situation. This is in the interest of decentralization. The British war office thus deals with a limited number of divisions. Each division headquarters deals with the component units of its division. To concentrate a complete field army of regulars and volunteers at any threatened point on the British coast, it would only be necessary to send one brief telegram to each of three or four division commanders. Each division commander could simply issue orders already prepared by his staff, for details of mobilization, concentration, supply, and transportation are always kept up to date by the permanent regular staff of the divisions. The advantage of such simplicity is obvious. Under our centralized system, instead of three or four units to deal with in cases of this kind, there would be a hundred or more units to deal with, a hundred or more telegrams to write, a hundred or more transportation and supply problems to solve, and all this at a time of diplomatic and political stress.

The simplicity of the British system is based on the fact that both regulars and citizen soldiers are organized in divisions in time of peace. Each division is simply a little army complete in itself, and the whole army or any given field army is simply an aggregation of divisions. The war office does not deal with all of the multitudinous units that comprise the force. An order to one division commander is an order to all of the component units of his division. Under this system the absolute minimum is left to extemporization. The citizen soldiers of Great Britain have a definite place in a machine which is as definitely organized as the regular army. With us the whole system must be extemporized. With us the Regular Army as well as the Volunteer Army is a complex of units without permanent grouping.

6. THE JOINT USE OF REGULARS AND CITIZEN SOLDIERY.

In the defense of Great Britain regular divisions and territorial divisions will be combined in field armies for joint action. Any group of two or more divisions will form a field army. This permits the two forces to cooperate fully in the national defense and yet bases the ultimate grouping of the divisions on the undoubted differences of function of the two forces. This is pointed out because a different theory of organization has been proposed in this country, based on the idea of mixing regular troops and citizen soldiery in the same divisions. It has been proposed to form divisions comprising two brigades of Regulars and one brigade of citizen soldiers or one brigade of Regulars and two brigades of citizen soldiers, with various other combinations of these two classes of troops. A slight consideration will show the fundamental defects of this system.

In the first place, regular troops may and frequently will be dispatched on special missions before the citizen soldiery is called out. If the normal division organization includes both classes of forces, every time the regular troops are detached to perform their special functions one or more of the divisions of the normal organization will be disrupted. Again, while trained volunteers will be fully effective in war, it can not be disputed that at the outbreak of war regular troops will have more training, greater endurance, and therefore higher maneuvering velocity. But a division is a fundamental army unit. If the regulars are formed in separate divisions, we will have a small force with the endurance and velocity necessary for the sudden strategic enterprises which determine the initiative in war. These divisions can move at once and may even be put in a favorable initial position for striking a blow at the very outbreak of war. They can be quietly concentrated in many cases before diplomatic and political conditions justify the calling out the National Guard or Volunteers. But if these forces are the component parts of mixed divisions they can not move as divisions at all until the citizen-soldier contingents of the divisions are embodied; and when they do more, the velocity and endurance of the mixed divisions will be determined by the condition of their newly mobilized elements. Under such an organization it will be impossible to utilize the special qualities of the highly trained nucleus, except at the expense of disrupting the normal organization at the very outbreak of war.

It is presumed that the main reason for suggesting the placing of regiments of citizen soldiery in brigades with regular regiments or the placing of citizen soldier brigades in divisions with regular brigades is to give raw troops the example of trained troops on the march and in battle. This will undoubtedly be an advantage in special cases, but it should not be made the basis of permanent organization. It should be our policy to develop our citizen soldiers in peace, so that they will no longer be raw troops when they meet the enemy. But the acceptance of this policy will not preclude the adoption of special measures to meet special occasions where raw troops must be employed to the best advantage. Even on the defensive, where untrained troops have always shown to the best advantage, it would seem that regular troops should not be completely dispersed in the trenches, but should be used as a reserve to repluse the main attack or to make an offensive counterstroke if an opportunity offers. Jackson's troops at New Orleans were able to hold an intrenched position with protected flanks, but he had no troops with sufficient organization or training to complete the victory by a vigorous pursuit of the defeated enemy.

We may therefore accept the following general principles as the basis of correct organization of our mobile forces:

1. The mobile elements of the Regular Army should have a divisional organization in time of peace. This requires that it be organized in tactical divisions, even if these divisions be incomplete and insufficient in number. Even a small army should be correctly organized as an army.

2. Every effort should be made to give a divisional organization to the organized citizen soldiery in time of peace. If our citizen soldiers ever go to war, they must be organized into divisions before they can be employed effectively against the enemy. In order to employ them promptly every possible detail of this organization should be settled in time of peace.

Whenever it becomes necessary to reenforce the Regular Army and the National Guard by volunteer organizations, it is important that they should be prepared for effective service in the minimum of time. This requires that they be formed by trained officers acting under prearranged plans. It is believed that this can best be accomplished by forming the new organizations as United States Volunteers under a national volunteer law like that proposed in S. 2518, known as the du Pont bill. (A copy of this bill, with a memorandum by Senator DU PONT on the history of the volunteer forces, is appended to this report as Appendix I.)

So long as our National Guard is organized under the militia clause of the Constitution it will be impracticable to provide Federal division commanders in time of peace. But under the power to organize and inspect the militia it would seem feasible to organize definite districts, to encourage the formation of the necessary units, and to give each division an inspection staff, through which the war preparation can be kept up in peace.

Each division district should contain a complete division, and all of the plans for its mobilization, supply (the supply-depot system should be extended so that the matériel and equipment necessary to equip any organization to war strength would be centrally stored within the division district. Requisitions should be filled from these depots and the stores issued replaced, so that a minimum of deterioration would result. The ideal condition would be to have this additional war equipment actually in the hands of organizations, but this can not be accomplished generally with the National Guard until adequate storage facilities have been supplied), and concentration should be prepared in peace and continually corrected to date. This can only be accomplished by assigning trained officers to arrange the details of organization under the supervision of the General Staff, which is intrusted by law with plans for war. Under present conditions it would be necessary to organize the fundamental war units after mobilization. The War College can and has prepared plans for such mobilization, but in the absence of a definite policy embodied in the law there is no assurance that such plans can be carried into effect. Solid and stable arrangements for mobilization can not be based on a hypothetical policy. Until there is a legalized system our actual mobilization will depend upon political conditions at the time of the crisis. Gaps in our legislation will be filled in haste, and no human agency will be able to predict what the law will be. Our traditional theory of a small Regular Army and a great war army of citizen soldiers is not yet embodied as a definite institution. The mobilization of our citizen soldiery to-day would not result in a well-knit national army. It would be an uncoordinated army of 50 allies, with all of the inherent weaknesses of allied forces emphasized by the unusual number of the allies.

A more detailed discussion of the national citizen soldiery will be presented in Chapter IX, after a consideration of the organization and distribution of the regular forces.

IV.

The peace administration of the regular land forces.

1. RELATIONS BETWEEN THE COAST ARTILLERY AND THE MOBILE ARMY.

The land forces of the United States are divided into two distinct parts, the Coast Artillery and the mobile army. The coast fortifications are local in character and are designed to protect important seaports from direct naval attacks and naval raids, to prohibit hostile landings at particular places, to secure our naval bases in the absence of the fleet, to prohibit the use of certain harbors and waters as bases for naval operations against us, to secure safe havens for our vessels, and to release our fleet for offensive operations. The influence of coast fortifications is limited to the areas within the range of their guns, and while they must be recognized as of supreme importance, within the scope of their proper functions, it must not be supposed that they have any power to prevent invasion if we should lose command of the sea. The total length of our coast line is enormous, and the stretches covered by harbor defenses are and must remain very small compared with the unprotected intervals that lie between them. If we should lose the command of the sea, an invader would simply land in one of these intervals. It therefore follows that our ultimate defense depends upon defeating a mobile army of invasion, and this can be done only by having a mobile army prepared to operate in any possible theater of war. The complete defense of our coasts is therefore a problem of cooperation between Coast Artillery and mobile forces.

2. ESSENTIAL DIFFERENCES AFFECTING THE ADMINISTRATION OF COAST ARTILLERY AND THE MOBILE ARMY IN PEACE AND WAR.

The general relations between the coast fortresses and the mobile troops have already been indicated. Their essential difference lies in the fact that the Coast Artillery is local and will remain local both in peace and in war. The mobile forces, however, will not be confined to a definite territory. They occupy peace stations for purposes of training, but it can never be predicted in what theater of war they may be employed. The coast batteries that cover the entrance to New York Harbor will remain in their present positions in any contingencies, but the mobile forces that may be stationed in the vicinity of New York may be employed at any place within the sphere of national interest.

A correct organization of the two forces should, therefore, be based upon a recognition of these essential differences. The Coast Artillery is territorialized and may properly have a territorial organization in war and peace.

The mobile army, however, must be free to move and should not be tied by its peace administration to any particular locality. The present organization of our Army violates this principle. The same brigadier general commands mobile troops and immobile troops under a system of administration which must necessarily break down in war.

The organization of the Department of the Gulf is a typical example of this illogical arrangement. This department comprises 1 regiment of Infantry, 1 regiment of Cavalry, and 27 companies of Coast Artillery. The organization seems to be based on some idea of convenience for peace administration, but is not designed to meet any military contingency. It is unsound, because the command itself is an illogical command, it being impossible to conceive any military situation which would properly place those units under a single commander in war. It is also unsound, because it must be immediately disrupted in war and the whole machinery of administration broken up at the very time when definite organization is of supreme importance. It would, therefore, seem that a correct organization of our land forces should provide homogeneous commands for our brigadier generals in time of peace. This can be accomplished by grouping the present Coast Artillery districts into three Coast Artillery inspections and by giving a definite brigade and division organization to the mobile troops. Under this arrangement the eastern territorial region will comprise two Coast Artillery inspections and the nucleus of the first division of the mobile army, with certain extra divisional auxiliaries. The central territorial region will comprise the nucleus of the second division of the mobile army, with two or more Cavalry brigades and other extra divisional troops. The western territorial region will comprise one Coast Artillery inspection and the nucleus of the third division of the mobile army.

With the present distribution of our mobile army a strict administration by tactical units is not wholly practicable, but under the policy of concentration proposed by the Secretary of War it is expected that the mobile army will ultimately be segregated in strategic localities so that tactical units may be trained and administered as such. There must be a period of transition, however, before this ideal can be realized, but during this period of transition the organization should be based upon the idea of the military employment of the troops. Because a force is dispersed can hardly be urged as a reason for an incorrect organization. The troops must ultimately receive a tactical organization before they can fight, and the fact that they are dispersed is really an additional reason for attempting to correct their organization in time of peace.

Even where mobile troops are concentrated the commander of the territorial region must perform certain territorial functions. In addition to the command of his tactical units he will generally have problems of recruitment and supply and may be charged with the preparation of plans for the joint use of Regulars and National Guard in several possible theaters of war, but the territorial functions should be kept separated from the tactical functions. (See note in reference to supply depots. These supply depots should be under the control of the territorial commanders recommended in this report. All plans for mobilization should be so completely worked out that the equipping of a unit to war strength should simply mean the releasing of the necessary equipment from the proper depot.) This can be accomplished by a proper organization of the staff. One part of the staff should deal with the mobile tactical units in the command and should be free to move when those units are assembled for war, while the other part of the staff should deal with the territorial functions, such as the care of posts and supply, and should continue to perform those functions after the troops have gone into the field.

It is a matter of no little inconvenience that the word "division" is rendered ambiguous in our service by being applied to two entirely distinct things. In all languages the name "division" is applied to a force of all arms which is the fundamental mobile army unit. The word is used in this sense with us, and it is also applied to the territorial areas into which it has been considered convenient to divide the country for purpose of military administration. It would be in the interest of clearness to find some means of avoiding this ambiguity, and for this purpose it is recommended that the term "division" be restricted in the future to the tactical unit of that name; that the term "department" be applied to the present territorial "divisions," and to all other independent territorial commands, and that brigadier generals be assigned to the command of brigades of mobile troops or of Coast Artillery inspections.

3. THE DISTRIBUTION OF THE MOBILE ARMY AND ITS RELATION TO TACTICAL ORGANIZATION AND ADMINISTRATION—THE POLICY OF SEGREGATION AS OUTLINED BY THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

The complete development of a tactical organization of the mobile army must depend upon a gradual correction of its present dispersion. The policy of the War Department with reference to this important question is given in the following extracts from the letter of the Secretary of War in reply to House resolution 343, second session, Sixty-second Congress (H. Doc. No. 490):

If the mobile army is to be efficient, its distribution must meet the following requirements:

1. It must be favorable for the tactical training of the three arms combine—Infantry, Cavalry, and Field Artillery.

2. It must be favorable for the rapid concentration of the Army upon our northern or southern frontier or upon our eastern or western seaboard.

3. It must favor the best use of the Army as a model for the general military training of the National Guard.

4. It must favor the use of the Regular Army as a nucleus for the war organization of the National Guard and such volunteer forces as Congress may authorize to meet any possible military emergency.

5. The distribution must favor economical administration with the view of developing the maximum return for the money appropriated for military purposes.

6. The distribution must permit a peace organization which will also be effective in war; that is, an organization which will permit a prompt expansion in time of war by means of a system of reserves.

These requirements can best be met by correcting the present dispersion of the mobile army. The mobile army is now scattered in 49 posts. It should be segregated into detachments of all arms, each of which can be readily assembled for team training by reasonable marches of concentration. Each of the several tactical groups should be stationed in the vicinity of strategic centers where facilities are favorable for transportation, administration, and supply. The exact location of these centers should depend upon a careful study of many considerations, but they may be approximately indicated as follows:

1. Two, and possibly three, groups on the line between the St. Lawrence and Atlanta, covering the Atlantic seaboard.

2. Two, and possibly three, groups on the line between Puget Sound and Los Angeles, covering the Pacific seaboard.

3. At least two groups between the Great Lakes and the Rio Grande serving as first reserves for either seaboard and as nuclei for the development of the National Guard and volunteer forces to be organized in the interior of the continent.

The number of groups to be organized is primarily restricted by the total strength of the mobile army. No group should contain less than a brigade of Infantry, with a proper proportion of Cavalry, Field Artillery, and special troops, and at least one group should contain a full tactical division. Proper tactical training demands the combined use of the three arms, and this can be secured only by massing the troops of each group in a single post or in several posts within marching distance of a common center. Without such concentration joint training can not be secured except at heavy expense for transportation. In addition to these detachments of all arms, there should be at least two independent Cavalry brigades.

A study of the question indicates that the stationing of our present mobile army in more than eight or possibly nine such groups would be inconsistent with the demands of maximum economy and tactical efficiency.

The solution of this problem is apparently complicated by the fact that the posts now occupied by the mobile army represent a large investment which must be abandoned if an efficient plant is to be established. But while most of the posts now occupied have lost their military value, the national military reservations have acquired a great value as real estate. As a business proposition it should be possible to refund the investment and largely finance the relocation of the Army from the proceeds of the sale of the real estate which is no longer needed for military purposes. The project would be similar in many respects to the Reclamation Service as now established by Congress. In that service a fund is formed from the proceeds of the sale of certain public lands, and from this fund certain approved projects are successively executed under general rules prescribed by Congress.

It is believed that the Army can in this way be scientifically distributed at an expense little if any in excess of the proceeds of the sales of the properties to be abandoned.

Studies at the War College indicate that if the present mobile army were concentrated in eight posts its cost would be reduced by about $5,500,000 per annum. In six years this saving would pay for the new quartering of the mobile army, even if nothing could be realized from the sale of real estate no longer needed.

But in applying the principles outlined above so many practical difficulties must be encountered that the solution for any particular group of posts can not be stated dogmatically. In a region where there are now several widely scattered posts it is obvious that maximum economy and efficiency will be attained when all of the troops in the region are so concentrated that the entire command can be assembled by marching and without the expense incident to rail transportation. But the actual plans for accomplishing such concentration should rest upon a careful and separate study of each region, with the view of ascertaining the best location in the particular region and the extent to which existing posts can be retained without prejudice to the broader economic and military interests of the Government. While there may be decided practical limitations upon efforts to perfect the distribution of the present force, much can be accomplished by recognizing sound principles in making future locations. In the gradual development of the mobile army a station now occupied by an isolated regiment may ultimately become one of a group occupied by a force of all arms. Where such a post is favorably located strategically, the tactical isolation may thus be economically corrected by the expansion of existing plant instead of by relocation.

The problem is thus seen to be one of great complexity, but the ultimate solution is clearly indicated. Whether the mobile army be increased or not, it should gradually be segregated into tactical groups, each group containing a force of all arms or a Cavalry brigade. The loci of the several groups should be carefully worked out in conformity with the general policy of placing the force so that it can be promptly employed upon either seaboard or upon either the northern or the southern land frontier of the country. But the present faulty distribution can not be corrected at once. New stations must be provided before old stations can be abandoned, but future changes should always be made with the view of the gradual formation of proper tactical commands.

4. A PROPOSED ORGANIZATION FOR THE PEACE ADMINISTRATION OF THE REGULAR LAND FORCES.

The three territorial divisions under which the Army is now administered conform to the three main strategic regions referred to in the letter of the Secretary of War. Each of these territorial areas contains a proportion of mobile troops, and in each of them the forces are widely dispersed. Under the general policy of concentration these forces will ultimately be segregated into two or more centers in each strategic region, and the troops of the several centers when assembled will constitute the nucleus of a tactical division and one or more Cavalry brigades. The peace organization of the mobile army should be based on these general strategic principles.

The mobile troops in the three main geographical regions should be organized as distinct mobile commands, and in such future increases of the mobile army as Congress may authorize it should be the national policy successively to expand the nuclear divisions into complete tactical divisions. Thus in due time a complete tactical division and one or more Cavalry brigades may be provided for each of three main strategic regions, and thereafter further expansion should be with the view of dividing the central region into two such territorial regions, so that complete tactical divisions, each with proper extra divisional troops, will eventually cover the northern and southern land frontiers and the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

Having in mind the distinct functions of the mobile forces and the seacoast fortifications, the following peace organization of the regular land forces is recommended:

EASTERN DEPARTMENT.

This department conforms to the present Eastern Division. Within this area the mobile troops will constitute the nucleus of the first tactical division, with a Cavalry brigade and certain other extra-divisional troops of the mobile army considered as an expeditionary force. The Coast Artillery within the department should be organized as two Coast Artillery inspections, as follows: 1. The North Atlantic inspection, comprising the Coast Artillery districts from Maine to the Delaware River, both inclusive. 2. The South Atlantic inspection, comprising the Coast Artillery districts from the Delaware River, exclusive, to Texas, inclusive.

CENTRAL DEPARTMENT.

This department conforms to the present Central Division. Within this area the mobile troops will constitute the nucleus of the second tactical division, with two or more Cavalry brigades and certain other extra-divisional troops of the mobile army regarded as an expeditionary force.

WESTERN DEPARTMENT.

This department conforms to the present Western Division. Within this area the mobile troops will constitute the nucleus of the third tactical division, with certain extra-divisional troops of the mobile army regarded as an expeditionary force. The Coast Artillery within the department should be organized as the Pacific inspection, comprising the Coast Artillery districts from Washington to California, both inclusive.

THE FOREIGN COMMANDS.

The Philippines Department, comprising all the troops serving within the Philippines.

The Hawaiian Department, comprising all the troops serving within the Hawaiian Islands. At present this is a department of the western division, but its special functions make it properly a separate command.

The Panama Department, comprising all the troops serving within the Canal Zone. This, too, will be a separate command in war and to tie it to a territorial command within the United States would simply produce confusion by providing a peace organization which must be disrupted in war time. It is and must remain a distinct command strategically.

The Porto Rico Regiment.—The Porto Rico Regiment is now a part of the Department of the East, but this affiliation can not continue in war. The isolation of this garrison requires the formation of a separate administration for it, but the small size of the garrison does not appear to justify the establishment of a separate department. The permanent administration of the Porto Rico garrison and its relation to the home forces is a problem that awaits further study. For the present it will probably be necessary to leave it attached to the proposed Eastern Department.

5. THE DIFFICULTY OF SECURING A TACTICAL ORGANIZATION IN PEACE, AS ILLUSTRATED BY THE ACTUAL DISTRIBUTION OF THE TROOPS IN THE PRESENT CENTRAL DIVISION.

The practical difficulties involved in providing a definite tactical organization in peace can be illustrated by considering the peace administration of the mobile forces now serving in the Central Division.

The troops in the Central Division were as follows, February 20, 1912 (this strength is subject to change, as ultimately some of these organizations will be sent to Panama or Oahu): 9 regiments of Infantry, 1 regiment of Mountain Artillery, 1 regiment Horse Artillery, 1½ regiments of Light Artillery, 6 regiments of Cavalry, 1 battalion of Engineers (1 company present, 3 companies under orders to join), 2 field companies Signal troops, 2 technical companies Signal troops, 1 field hospital, 2 ambulance companies.

It will be observed that the command comprised 1 Infantry division, substantially complete, and 2 Cavalry brigades. The tactical organization of these units would be as follows:

THE INFANTRY DIVISION.

3 brigades of Infantry, 3 regiments each.
1 brigade of Artillery, 1½ regiments Light and 1 regiment Mountain.
1 regiment of divisional Cavalry.
1 battalion of Engineers, 4 companies.
2 field companies Signal troops.
1 field hospital.
1 ambulance company.

THE FIRST CAVALRY BRIGADE.

3 regiments of Cavalry.
1 battalion of Horse Artillery.

THE SECOND CAVALRY BRIGADE.

2 regiments of Cavalry.
1 battalion of Horse Artillery.

If these forces should remain in the central territorial region they would ultimately, under the policy proposed by the Secretary of War, be concentrated in a few closely allied groups of stations, as follows: 3 Infantry brigade commands, each command comprising a full Infantry brigade and a detachment of divisional Field Artillery and Cavalry; 2 Cavalry brigade commands, each command comprising two or more regiments of Cavalry with one or more batteries of Horse Artillery.

The bulk of the divisional Artillery could be distributed among the brigade commands or could be concentrated at some place like Fort Sill, where experimental Artillery practice would be practicable. The Engineers, sanitary troops, Signal troops, and other auxiliaries would be attached to groups where most convenient.

It is obvious that with this arrangement there would be a maximum economy of administration and maximum facilities for training. It is also obvious that under such an arrangement the division and Cavalry brigades would be most promptly available for war or for expeditionary purposes. The territorial commander in his peace administration would be concerned with 6 or 7 stations instead of 22 stations, as at present. All of the troops could be concentrated for active service with a minimum of friction and all would be prepared for such service by their peace training. The Infantry division, when assembled, would assemble under the general officers who had trained the brigades in peace, and the Cavalry brigades would be definite organizations in peace and war.

But while the advantages of this organization are obvious, it can serve as little more than a goal of future policy, for under actual conditions the troops are not only dispersed but are so mixed that not even a reenforced brigade can be assembled without splitting up the peace organization and then extemporizing a new command. The situation becomes apparent upon an examination of the actual peace organization which follows:

6. THE PRESENT SUBDIVISION OF COMMANDS IN THE CENTRAL TERRITORIAL DIVISION.

On February 20, 1912, the mobile troops of the Central Division were subdivided for command as follows:

The Department of the Lakes.—Four and one-third regiments of Infantry, one battery of Field Artillery, one squadron of Cavalry.

These troops are scattered in six posts, extending from Michigan to North Dakota.

The Department of the Missouri.—Two regiments of Infantry (each regiment lacked one battalion, which was stationed in some other department); two regiments of Cavalry; one field company, signal troops; two technical companies, signal troops.

These troops are scattered in six posts, extending from Iowa to Wyoming.

The Department of Texas.—One and one-third regiments of Infantry, one and one-third regiments of Cavalry, one regiment of Field Artillery (less one battalion), one regiment of Field Artillery (less one battery).

These troops are scattered in six posts, extending from Arkansas to New Mexico.

Brigade Post No. 1 (Fort D. A. Russell).—One regiment of Infantry; one regiment of Cavalry; one regiment of Mountain Artillery; one field company, signal troops; one field hospital; one ambulance company.

Brigade Post No. 2 (Fort Riley).—One regiment of Cavalry, one regiment of Horse Artillery.

Brigade Post No. 3 (Fort Leavenworth).—One regiment of Infantry; one squadron of Cavalry; one battalion of Engineers (one company present, the other three en route to join); one ambulance company.

Each of the above detachments is to be commanded by a brigadier general, but it will be observed that not a single detachment is the appropriate command for an officer of that rank. An Infantry brigade could be formed in the Department of the Lakes, but if it should go to the front under the department commander there would be a residue of one and one-third regiments of Infantry, one squadron of Cavalry, and one battery of Field Artillery left in the department without a department commander. To form a second Infantry brigade another department commander would leave his command, but in this case it would be necessary to disrupt two or more of the peace commands in order to find him a brigade.

Under the present policy of administration by territorial divisions all administration is concentrated in the hands of the division commander, and the department commanders have been restricted to the tactical supervision and instruction of the troops assigned to them. This is undoubtedly a step in the right direction, for the difficulties of mobilization above indicated would be greatly increased if each of the brigadier generals were absorbed, as formerly, in purely administrative duties. The assignment of tactical duties to brigadier generals is sound in principle and conforms to the practice of all well-organized armies. But, in order to secure the desired advantages, it is essential that the brigadier general be assigned an appropriate command and one that he will continue to command in the field. If he be assigned such a command he will prepare it for war and the relation between the leader and troops will be established in peace. But to give him a command that can not approximate to war conditions, one in fact that must be disrupted on mobilization, is not a step toward sound organization.

An examination of the subdivision of command in the Central Division will show that the present organization does not meet the required conditions. The Department of the Missouri comprises four battalions of Infantry and two full regiments of Cavalry. No military situation is conceivable that would continue this affiliation in war. It is not a brigade, because it is not homogeneous. A brigadier general's proper command is a brigade of his own arm. If such a brigade is together, he can command it and instruct it to great advantage. But even if it be dispersed he can at least inspect it, supervise its instruction, and prepare the plans for its mobilization and concentration. The only thing definite that can be said of the force under the commander of the Department of the Missouri is that the peace-command unit will cease to exist when war comes. It is an organization without tactical stability, and it is not even a proper inspection unit for a brigadier general. A cavalry brigadier general is the proper tactical inspector and instructor of a cavalry brigade, and an infantry brigadier general is the proper tactical inspector and instructor of an infantry brigade.

7. A PLAN OF TACTICAL ORGANIZATION AND ADMINISTRATION ADAPTED TO THE PRESENT DISPERSION OF THE MOBILE ARMY.

Under the policy of concentration proposed by the Secretary of War the commands will ultimately be segregated so that they can be administered tactically, but the practical question is to find some method of administration that will preserve a logical tactical organization during the period of transition. The Infantry division and the two Cavalry brigades in the Central Division should be tactical entities, even if they are dispersed and mixed. There should be some means of forming an organization in which the several brigades can have the guidance and supervision of their appropriate commanders in time of peace. The solution seems to lie in a recognition of the fact that the territorial region actually contains three Infantry brigades, two Cavalry brigades, and one Field Artillery brigade. Here are the proper commands, or inspection districts, for six brigadier generals, three of Infantry, two of Cavalry, and one of Field Artillery. It is impracticable to segregate the six brigades immediately, but it is not impracticable to make each brigadier general the inspector and tactical supervisor of a brigade of his own arm. The territorial region now comprises precisely that number of brigade commanders, but not one of these brigade commanders is identified with a logical brigade unit.

The administration of the several posts is already in the hands of the territorial commander. The brigadier generals have become tactical inspectors, but are apportioned by geographical areas, and without reference to the composition of the troops under them. It would seem that a real tactical administration could be accomplished in the following manner:

1. Let each post be considered as a detachment directly under the territorial commander. This meets all administrative requirements.

2. Let the troops of the several arms be formed into brigades with a brigadier general or colonel of the proper arm assigned as the inspector of each brigade. While the brigade remains dispersed in several posts the brigade commander inspects it, supervises its tactical instruction under the orders of the territoral commander, and prepares to lead it into the field if it is called out for expeditionary purposes. As soon as the brigade is actually assembled under the policy of concentration, the brigade commander will be stationed with it, but during the transition he will at least keep the unit formed as an organized tactical entity.

3. The number of brigades should be determined by the number of regiments and not by the number of available brigadier generals. If not enough general officers are provided, the senior colonel of the brigade should perform the function of brigade inspector.

4. The organization of the staff of the territorial command should be based on a recognition of the separateness of the territorial and tactical functions of the commander. As a territorial commander he is concerned with posts, reservations, administrations, and supply. As a tactical commander he is concerned with the constituent brigades and special units of his command. One function is territorial and fixed, the other is mobile and goes with troops.

5. In the mobile army, the assignment of regiments to brigades for purposes of tactical supervision and inspection should supersede the present territorial departments. They are no longer necessary for administrative purposes, and as inspection districts they are illogical because they do not include logical tactical commands.

6. The only necessary territorial unit is the department proposed herein as a substitute for the "territorial division." The brigade commanders are the tactical assistants of this territorial commander. If a special tactical situation develops within a territorial command, such as the recent crisis along the Mexican border, it is only necessary for the territorial commander to assign the local military problem to one of his brigadier generals. That officer will ordinarily employ all or part of his own brigade, but under such circumstances all the troops in the region will be assigned to his command and additional troops will be forwarded to him if necessary.

7. The brigade commander, in addition to inspecting and supervising the instruction of his brigade, should be responsible for its mobilization and concentration. The brigade under this plan is a continuing unit in peace and war. Under present conditions every organization above the regiment must be extemporized.

8. The proposed arrangement provides a tactical organization even under the present unsatisfactory distribution. As the distribution is corrected under the policy of the War Department, the brigade-inspection districts will become more compact and ultimately will become concentrated brigade commands.

9. The proposed arrangement provides the basis for an organization applicable alike to the Regular Army regarded as an expeditionary force and as the nucleus of the greater war army. Each brigadier general is definitely identified with a brigade of the expeditionary force, and is also available to assist the territorial commander in the solution of the broader problems connected with the development of all the military resources within the limits of the territorial command.

It is therefore recommended:

(1) That the Coast Artillery districts within the United States be formed into three Coast Artillery inspections, as outlined in this memorandum.

(2) That the territorial departments as now organized within the United States be abolished; that the term department be applied to the three large territorial commands now known as "divisions," and that the mobile troops now serving therein be organized for purposes of inspection, supervision, and mobilization into brigade inspections of Infantry, Cavalry, and Field Artillery.

(3) That there should be a brigade inspection for each tactical brigade of Infantry, Cavalry, and Field Artillery, and that to each brigade inspection there should be assigned a brigade commander or inspector of the rank of brigadier general, or of colonel if sufficient gener officers are not available.

(4) That the brigade commanders herein provided should be responsible for the tactical inspection and mobilization of their several brigades and should be available for such other duties as may be assigned to them by the commander of the territorial department.

(5) That the brigade commanders herein provided should be assigned to appropriate stations by the commander of the territorial department in which their brigades may be serving.

The application of these principles to the peace organization of the mobile army is shown in detail in Chapter VIII of this report.

8. QUARTERING AND ADMINISTERING THE MOBILE TROOPS IN PEACE.

Having properly organized the mobile troops and located the elements of brigades and divisions so that they may be periodically assembled for combined training, the next step is to simplify all details of administration and remove unnecessary distractions, so that attention may be concentrated on training. Administration becomes unduly cumbersome, and many distractions are caused at the present time on account of the fact that the troops are generally located in what may be called garrison villages, involving a most elaborate variety of buildings, parkways, roads, sewer and water systems, etc. A great deal of the energy of troops is required to care for these elaborate establishments. When our troops were scattered throughout the western country it was necessary to provide these isolated posts. Under existing conditions it is believed that the rational and economic way of disposing of our troops in time of peace is to quarter them in simple but substantial buildings in or near large towns, where all existing utilities may be made use of, and to build these quarters in such a manner that the minimum of time and attention will be required for their maintenance and upkeep. It is believed that if thus located and quartered a better class of enlisted men may be secured for Army service; that all necessary elementary instruction can be given in the barrack yard, or within a short marching distance of the barracks; and that for more advanced training the troops should be marched to places where a large amount of varied territory may be available.

V.

The necessity of a reserve system.

1. MAINTENANCE OF STRENGTH IN WAR.

An army is an expensive machine, maintained in order to support national interests in time of emergency. The economic efficiency of an army should therefore be measured by the effective fighting power which it is proposed to develop and maintain in war. It must not only be able to develop a high fighting efficiency at the outbreak of war, but it must be able to maintain that efficiency during the progress of the campaign. As soon as war begins military forces are subject to heavy losses, and unless means are definitely provided for replacing these losses the military machine will immediately deteriorate. The losses in war are not only the losses in battle, but losses due to disease and losses due to the hardship of campaign. The Prussian Guard Corps in its marches to Sedan lost 5,000 men on the march alone. It was necessary for the corps to arrive at the battle field in time, and that required a velocity of march that was more destructive than battle. It should be remembered that the soldiers in this force were trained soldiers and that the guard corps arrived and fought at Sedan in spite of its march losses. A force of soft or raw troops could not have arrived at all.

Careful training is necessary to prepare troops for war; but it must be recognized that wastage will occur, and that if a really effective force is to be maintained trained men must be supplied to replace this wastage.

It is the experience of modern warfare that any given unit loses at least 50 per cent of its strength in the first six months of war. If this loss is not replaced there is 50 per cent deterioration in the power of the unit, and if it is replaced by raw men the quality of the force as a highly trained team is destroyed.

This problem has an important economic aspect that has been ignored throughout our military history. Military forces are maintained at great expense through long periods of peace in order to meet a brief emergency in war. Sound economics, therefore, demands that the peace expenditure be justified by unquestioned war efficiency. A company of infantry with three officers should contain the maximum number of trained riflemen that three capable officers can command. This maximum appears to be about 150 men; but if the company starts in the campaign with 150 men, the natural wastage of war will immediately reduce it below that number. If the vacancies are not filled, it ceases to be an economical company, because under these conditions we have a less number of men than three trained officers should control; and, on the other hand, if the vacancies are filled by untrained men, the company ceases to be a trained team, as under these conditions the three officers can not effectively command 150 men in action.

The United States is the only nation that has no scientific means of meeting this situation. In all of our wars the companies first sent into the field have dwindled away in strength, and as these units have dwindled away new levies under untrained officers have been organized. The result has been that our wars have been long and protracted and attended by great sacrifices of blood and treasure. Each battle has generally been followed by a period of inactivity. Such an army has no power to keep up persistent military activity.

Without some solution of this problem there can be no definite military organization. The organization of divisions and other higher military units is based on the principle that the three arms should be combined in definite proportions. The infantry division is differently organized in different countries, but in all countries it consists of from 10,000 to 15,000 infantrymen, with from 4 to 6 field guns per thousand rifles, and with similar definite proportions of cavalry, engineers, signal troops, and other auxiliaries. The infantry strength is the basis of organization. In every army except our own the number of infantrymen is definite and fixed, because means of replacing losses are provided in time of peace. With us, however, the infantry strength is an absolute variable. We can only predict that the effective strength of each unit will fall after war begins. Under these conditions the division is not a continuing unit. Its components are fluid and indefinite, and there can be no stable organization under such conditions.

2. The Solution of the Problem.

The solution of this problem is very simple, and it is a significant fact that the same solution has been adopted in all modern armies. It is only necessary to provide that a man's army service shall consist of two periods, one period with the colors and the other a period of war obligation for a limited time after leaving active service. Under these circumstances when war is declared the active army is at once sent into the field, and the former soldiers having a war obligation are assembled in depots, where they can be forwarded to the front as needed. At the same time raw recruits are enlisted and trained at the depot. As losses occur at the front, they are filled first by forwarding trained men from the depot, and if the number of these is sufficient new recruits are not forwarded until after they have had a sufficient period of training. The result is that even in a long war, which would ultimately require the services of thousands of raw recruits, it is so arranged that no man goes to the front until he is trained for active service and sufficiently hardened and disciplined to bear the stress of modern war. Under such a system the full energy of military activity can be maintained up to the limit of available recruits. Each unit works at its maximum efficiency, and the war power of the nation is developed with a minimum expenditure of life and money.

It thus appears that an army reserve is not a means of creating new forces or new units in time of war, but is a necessary means of maintaining the war strength of the peace establishment, such as it may be.

3. Power of Expansion.

But while one of the primary and necessary functions of a reserve system is to replace losses during the period required for the training of raw recruits, the principal function is to furnish the trained men necessary to pass from a peace to a war footing. If we have a reserve of trained men upon whom we can count in war, it is possible greatly to reduce the cost of the military establishment by giving it a minimum peace strength. Under our system our units are maintained in peace at considerably less than war strength, but there are no means of expanding to the war strength except by the absorption of untrained men. In every other modern army the economical peace strength is maintained without loss of war efficiency because trained reserves are available for a prompt expansion with trained men.

The effect of the reserve system on the cost of peace establishments can be illustrated in the following way: Let us suppose that we require a regular army of 100,000 men on the outbreak of war and that we propose to maintain this force in full effectiveness throughout the campaign. This requires that means should be provided for avoiding a deterioration of the force due to the absorption of raw recruits to replace the first losses of the campaign. It may be predicted that the losses will be 50 per cent, or 50,000 men, in the first six months, but before the expiration of six months, if we begin training recruits at once, some of the new men will be prepared to go to the front. We may, therefore, adopt a factor of safety of 25 per cent instead of 50 per cent and assume that the maintenance of 100,000 men will require an initial organized strength of 125,000 men if there be no reserves. Under conditions prevailing in the United States this force would cost probably $800 per man, or $100,000,000 per year.

But, if we had a system of reserves, the same effective war strength could be maintained at a greatly reduced cost. If the military establishment comprised 75,000 men with the colors and 50,000 men with the reserve, its cost would not exceed $65,000,000 per year, and yet its war effectiveness would be just as great as the more expensive force without the reserves.

The economic effect of a reserve system, therefore, is to reduce the per capita cost of any given army at the same time assuring maximum effectiveness in war. If we do not have reserves, we are committed to a policy of maximum cost. It has been urged that a reserve system for the Regular Army is essentially foreign to our institutions and connected in some way with compulsory military service. It is true that the nations having a system of compulsory service also have a reserve system, but it is also true that Great Britain regards her regular army reserve as an indispensable part of her system of voluntary service. Great Britain did not adopt the reserve system until after her army broke down in the Crimean War because reserves were lacking. Her highly trained, long-service army almost immediately melted away. There was no way of renewing its strength except with untrained men. She found that without reserves her army was not adapted to the requirements of war.

The provision of a regular army reserve is purely a business proposition. The economic value of the reserve does not depend in any way upon its size. It is to be hoped that we can develop a sufficient reserve, but even a small reserve will reduce the per capita cost of the Army and increase its effectiveness.

If we had had only 6,000 men, that number would have been sufficient to have raised the recent San Antonio maneuver division to war strength. If we should have enough to replace the initial losses of war, we would be assured of sufficient time to train and harden raw recruits before forwarding them to the front. If we should have enough more to give us some power of expansion, we would be able to reduce the per capita cost of our peace establishment to a minimum without loss of war efficiency.

4. Proposed Plan for a Regular Army Reserve.

In adopting a new policy in our Army it is important that present conditions should not be disturbed more violently than necessary. The present term of enlistment is three years, and our men are accustomed to enlisting for that period of active service. It is therefore believed that in adopting a reserve system the normal period with the colors should be taken as three years. It is also important that the enlistment contract should be definite in so far as it affects the obligations assumed by the recruit. The important thing is to take a step toward the new policy, leaving its perfection to the experience of the future.

It is therefore recommended that the enlistment contract be for six years, with the understanding that the first three years are to be served with the colors and that during the last three years the man shall be furloughed to a reserve, where he shall be subject to duty in time of war only. It should be further understood that men so furloughed should not be included in the authorized peace strength of the Army.

But while the definite agreement is to be for three years with the colors and three with the reserve the Government should have the option of modifying these periods in its discretion and upon the application of the man. The man should have the privilege of applying to go to the reserve before the expiration of three years, the granting of the privilege to be at the option of the Government. So far as the man is concerned, this is a privilege but not a right. The man should also have the privilege of applying to remain with the colors for more than three years at the discretion of the Government. This is also a privilege and not a right. The right to go to the reserve at the end of three years is absolute, but the privilege of going at any other time or of remaining longer is to be at the option of the Government. If a man of good character desires to go to the reserve at the end of one year, if he has sufficient training to be a good reservist and if recruiting conditions are favorable for replacing him by a new man it is undoubtedly to the interest of the Government to pass him to the reserve.

On the other hand, if a man desires to remain longer than three years with the colors it may be to the public interest to grant his request, especially if at the time considered there is difficulty in obtaining recruits. This system will give great flexibility without sacrificing definiteness in the recruiting contract. Practically under any system the number of men that may be passed to the reserve before the expiration of the three-year period will depend upon whether their vacancies can be filled by new recruits, for the peace strength must be maintained. If only a few men desire to enlist, it will only be practicable to send a few to the reserve before their regular term. If a large number desire to enlist, it will be practicable at that time to send the maximum number to the reserve, and it will always be in the public interest to send as many to the reserve as may be done without loss of the necessary peace strength. The ideal solution would be obtained if recruiting conditions should permit the adoption of the following policy:

1. No extension of the color period, or reenlistment, except for the noncommissioned officers, who must form part of the permanent machine for training purposes, with enough selected privates to maintain the corps of noncommissioned officers.

2. Reduction of the color period for all sufficiently trained men who apply to pass to the reserve before the expiration of the contract period of three years.

The actual conditions can be met by a definite contract of three years with the colors and three years with the reserve, with discretion in the President to prescribe regulations for the reduction or extension of the contract color period in order to meet the special requirements of the several arms of the service.

The President should also have the power, when funds for the purpose have been appropriated by Congress, to order reservists to military posts or camps for target practice or other instruction for not to exceed 10 days in any one year.

5. The Relation of the Reserve System to Foreign Service.

The proposed system will also meet the special circumstances of home service or foreign service. No new or special enlistment contract will be necessary, but as the Government interest is different in the two cases there would simply be a difference in governmental policy. When a man enlists for service in the Philippines he would be held strictly to three years' color service. It would not be to the public interest in this case to pass him to the reserve before the full term of his contract has expired, and on the other hand, in this case it would be to the public interest to permit him to extend his contract to the full six years if he applied to do so. In other words, a short color service and a long reserve service is desirable at home, because the home army must have power of expansion; and long color service and a short reserve service is desirable in the foreign garrisons, because they do not have power of expansion. Either condition is met by the flexible reserve system proposed. But while, as a general rule, it would not be desirable to shorten the period of color service in the foreign garrisons, it would probably be very desirable to do so in the case of those reservists who desire to settle in the foreign possession. If a soldier in Oahu should assume the reserve status in Oahu, it would be most decidedly to the public interest to encourage him to live there and replace him by another recruit. This is true because in the event of war every former soldier residing in Oahu will positively increase our war power in that island.

6. Unorganized Reserves.

There are two aspects of the reserve problem. In order to have reserves we must have reserve material, and we must also provide some means of utilizing this material. Under present conditions the soldiers who pass into civil life are military reserves. No means are provided for utilizing them, but the fact that they exist in civil life is nevertheless a positive military asset. It is, therefore, evident that any policy which tends to reduce the total number of these men is prejudicial to our interest, whether we have an organized reserve system or not. For this reason a long enlistment period is contrary to the national military interest. An officer who has considered the enlistment question purely from the standpoint of his own company or regiment has only examined one phase, and a very minor one, of the question. So long as he approaches it from this point of view he naturally prefers a long enlistment and as many reenlistments as possible. This requires the minimum number of new recruits to train and gives him a company which requires a minimum of effort on the part of the officer. But for lack of trained men to supply wastage such a company will rapidly deteriorate in war. It is not believed that any officer who has studied the question of enlistment from the standpoint of broad national interest will advocate a long enlistment without a reserve feature.

It has been urged that it is not necessary to organize a Regular Army reserve, because discharged soldiers can be used to best advantage in the National Guard or in volunteers. But such use of them does not meet the real problem of maintaining losses in the Regular Army, and this is the true function of such men. As we maintain a Regular Army and expect to use it in war we must provide some means of keeping it at effective strength in war. We not only desire to use these men in war, but we should be able to control and predetermine the place where they are to be used. They have been trained by the Regular Army, they are accustomed to Regular Army service, and in most cases they are not attracted to the National Guard. They should be available for immediate absorption in the strategic force with which we desire to secure the initiative in war.

7. Status of the Reservist.

The law should give the reserve soldier a status of furlough. He should be regarded as a regular soldier, who, after a period of training, is released, except for war purposes. He should be required to report his address from time to time, and should be kept informed as to the place where he is to report upon mobilization. At the time of these stated reports he should receive a nominal pay, but the hold of the Government upon him should be based upon the furlough status rather than upon the money consideration. If he fails to comply with the conditions of the furlough status, the furlough should be revoked and he should be returned to the ordinary conditions of military service. It has been suggested that keeping track of reservists would involve great difficulties. There would no doubt be practical questions to solve, but none of the difficulties would seem to be insuperable. It is expected that these difficulties will be reduced in the future. With permanent regiments on foreign service, the regiments at home will be localized, and where regiments are stationed in populous districts there is no reason why the reservists in such districts should not be assigned directly to regiments. In this way such organizations will keep in touch with their own reservists. If a reserve system is authorized, the means of carrying it into effect should be made as flexible as possible and left to the discretion of the Secretary of War.

8. Special Reserves.

The main function of the Regular Army reserve is to raise the Regular Army to war strength and to maintain its war strength until raw recruits can be prepared for service at the front. Ordinarily it should not be called out except when war is imminent, but it would be a great advantage if the President could be given the power to call out sufficient reserves at any time to raise a small expeditionary force to war strength.

While the reserves should normally contain only those men who are completing their Regular Army service, provision should be made for the voluntary reenlistment of reservists for another stated period, provided such volunteers have the necessary physical qualifications and training, regulations governing such reenlistments to be determined by the Secretary of War.

There should also be provisions for enlistment in the reserve of soldiers who may have been discharged from the Army before the inauguration of the reserve system. It is believed that a considerable number of these men would assume the war obligation if there were some definite means of offering their services. Such enlistments, of course, should be subject to medical examination and a scrutiny of the record of the particular man.

9. Reserve Officers.

The reserve system outlined above is designed to maintain the effective and economical enlisted strength, but it makes no provision for the increased number of officers that will become necessary in war. In modern military operations the loss of officers is fully as great as the loss of enlisted men, and, further, under our system it will become necessary to detach officers from the regular establishment for staff duty and for employment with the citizen soldiery. The successful maintenance of large companies requires the presence of the full quota of officers, and the whole machine breaks down if suitable men are not forthcoming.

The lack of some provision of this kind is one of the greatest defects in our military system. This defect has been recognized to a certain extent in the amended militia law, which provides that individuals who pass certain examinations may be placed on a list of persons available for appointment as volunteer officers in war. In the volunteer bill (S. 2518) now pending in the Senate it is provided that when officers are detached from the Regular Army on duty with the Volunteers their vacancies may be filled by the assignment of a corresponding number of Volunteer officers to the regular organizations. But neither of these provisions meets the specific requirement of providing a reserve of junior officers for the organizations in the Regular Army. And yet there is an abundance of such material which can easily be made available. We maintain military instructors at a great many schools and colleges in the country, on the theory that such military training will become a military asset in war, and yet the young men who graduate at such institutions pass out into civil life without any definite place for them in our military establishment. They may in some cases go into the National Guard, some of them may enter the regular service, and some of them, no doubt, may find a place in the volunteer armies of the future, but the prospect of employing them is vague and contingent upon a great variety of uncertain conditions.

It is believed that it would be in the interest of sound policy to utilize young men of this type as reserve lieutenants in the Regular Army. Upon their graduation opportunities could be given them to serve with regular organizations at camps of instruction or maneuvers. After such probationary service, if found to be properly qualified, they could be commissioned for a limited number of years under an obligation to serve in war. This class of reserve officers would be recruited mainly from the schools and colleges, but the appointments should be open to other suitable classes, such as former members of the Regular Army, Volunteers, and National Guard who comply with proper conditions to be determined by the Secretary of War. These reserve lieutenants would be analogous to the officers of the Medical Reserve Corps of the Army. They should be definitely commissioned, assigned to an arm, and authorized to wear the uniform of that arm. Their names should be carried in the Army Register, and under certain conditions they should be attached to definite organizations of the Regular Army, serving in the neighborhood of their homes. They should receive no pay except when called into the service, but should have the privilege of serving at maneuvers and of volunteering as members of expeditionary forces. They should also be regarded as a preferred class from which civilian appointments in the Regular Army should be made. The value of such a force in war would be incalculable. By having a full quota of officers it would always be possible to maintain the maximum economical strength of the Regular Army. They would replace losses due to the ordinary casualties in war and would enable the Regular Army to spare more officers for employment in the greater war force. On the outbreak of war the reserve lieutenants should mobilize with the reserves and should proceed to the front as the reserves are called to the front. At the depots they could assist in recruiting and in the training of recruits and would perform many functions which must be left to chance under our present system. It is also believed that such reserve commissions would be appreciated as an honor by the best type of young men and that it would be no more than a proper reward to them for giving a part of their college training to preparation for military service in war.

There are now over 300 lieutenants of the Army on detached service. If the law authorized the President to put on active duty not to exceed 300 of these reserve officers to fill the places of lieutenants necessarily absent on detached service it would enable these reserve officers to obtain practical instruction, and it would facilitate the administration of the organizations concerned.

Attention is invited to the availability of the Military Academy at West Point as a source of supply of reserve officers and to the wisdom of making this source available. The Academy as now conducted handles between six and seven hundred cadets. Its capacity for efficient training is much more than that number, and, like any investment, the institution is not making the returns it should to the country unless its output is the maximum possible. Existing or probable vacancies in the Regular Army should not be considered in this connection. Existing vacancies could be given to graduates under an equitable plan, while the remaining graduates could return to their homes under an obligation to serve in the Regular Army, National Guard, or Volunteers. They would have the foundation of an education for any walk in life. In a few years the country would have in these graduates a corps of reserve officers with uniform training and uniform ideas regarding efficiency and duty.

10. Reserves for the Citizen Soldiery.

When the citizen soldiery is called into the service of the United States it, too, will encounter influences that will tend to reduce its strength. It should have sufficient reserves to maintain full strength until raw recruits can be prepared for the front, and unless its organizations are maintained at full strength in time of peace it should have enough other reservists to cover the expansion upon mobilization. Under present law, however, the Organized Militia bases its organization upon that of the Regular Army, and until a reserve system is provided for the Regular Army, arguments for a National Guard reserve would not be convincing or effective.

Under present conditions the citizen soldiery will mobilize at greatly reduced enlisted strength. It must go to the front with an expensive excess of officers in proportion to its effective strength, or its employment must be deferred until it can absorb a great mass of untrained and undisciplined material. In Chapter IX of this report the advantages of a definite peace organization for the citizen soldiery will be presented. Among the objects to be sought through such an organization will be the provision of a uniform peace strength with arrangements for war expansion and for the replacement of losses during the initial stages of war. Through the lack of such arrangements in the past our armies of citizen soldiery have been maintained at maximum cost and minimum effectiveness.

11. Prolongation of the Term of Service in Time of Emergency.

Under present laws, if war is declared, it is possible for many men to demand their discharges for expiration of term of service in the first crisis of war and before they can give the Government any real return for the cost of their training. Some nations meet this contingency by reserving the right to retain soldiers in times of emergency for a limited period beyond their ordinary term of service. While Great Britain has the same system of voluntary service as our own, she reserves the right to "prolong" the service of enlisted men for a limited period upon the imminence of war, this being a condition inserted in the enlistment contract. It is believed that such a provision should be embodied in our military law and that it should be made applicable to the Regular Army and to the citizen soldiery. After training a man at great expense in time of peace the Government should have the right to hold him in time of emergency at least until a raw recruit can be trained to replace him.

12. The Relation of Localization to the Reserve Problem and to Recruitment.

It has been indicated that the establishment of permanent foreign garrisons will permit localization of the units of the Regular Army at home. This will result in great economies of transportation and will lead to the development of many reforms which are almost impracticable so long as the organizations of the Army are shifted from place to place. The localization of the Army at home will facilitate the development of a reserve system, for where regiments are stationed in the populous parts of the country they will be able, in many cases, to keep in touch directly with their reserves, and also to obtain their recruits locally. The present recruiting system is based on recruiting for a shifting army. The service has been conducted with great ability and meets actual conditions, but it is wasteful and expensive as compared with a system of local recruiting for a localized army. Under present conditions the recruiting service comprises a total enlisted strength of 2,200 men. In addition there are not to exceed 4,800 recruits at the depots. These men are not immediately available as part of organized tactical units and constitute an element of waste in the military establishment. Wherever a regiment is so stationed that it can secure its own recruits in its own locality, it is obvious that the enlisted strength of the recruiting service can be correspondingly reduced. If all of the regiments of the Army were able to obtain their recruits locally, it is obvious that all of these men could be restored to the effective strength of the Army. It is not contended that this reform can or should be attempted immediately, but as the Army becomes localized it should be gradually accomplished. Under present conditions men are discharged at all periods of the year, and small detachments of recruits are received throughout the year. Under these conditions there can be no definite period of recruit training. Under ideal conditions, with a reserve system and localized recruiting, it would be possible for a regiment to pass all of its reservists to the reserve about the 1st of November, and then devote itself for a few weeks to the problem of obtaining new recruits. This would make the winter a period of recruiting and recruit training, and would make it possible to devote all of the summer and fall to higher military training without the evils of a continual influx of recruits. Practically, it may be impossible to recruit the whole Army in this way, but every step toward it will tend to increase the efficiency of the Army and to diminish the large detachments of noneffectives, which, under present conditions, must be maintained in order to keep up the strength of the Army.

VI.

The tactical organization of mobile troops.

The division is the fundamental army unit in which the several arms are combined for joint action in the field. It is essentially a small army complete in itself and capable of independent action. Larger forces, such as field armies, are simply aggregations of two or more divisions, with such additional auxiliaries as may be required for the particular terrain and mission.

The details of division organization are different in different countries, but the essential idea is that a division is a force of infantry provided with a proper proportion of field artillery and cavalry and supported by certain special units which are concerned with the special problems of field engineering, communication, transportation, supply, and sanitation.

1. INFANTRY.

Under our system the company of infantry at war strength should comprise the maximum number of trained riflemen that can be handled effectively in action by three officers. This number appears to be about 128 men, or 16 squads of 8 men each. As there will always be losses from casualties, the total strength will not be available on the firing line, and for this reason 8 additional riflemen should be added to the war strength as a reasonable factor of safety. In order to give the desired strength the following is recommended as the war organization of the infantry company: 1 captain, 1 first lieutenant, 1 second lieutenant, 1 first sergeant, 1 quartermaster sergeant, 6 sergeants, 16 corporals, 3 cooks, 1 artificer, 2 musicians, 120 privates; total commissioned, 3; total enlisted, 150.

The peace strength of the company of infantry is governed by several considerations:

1. It is desirable for fiscal reasons to reduce the peace strength to a minimum. But such reductions of strength are fatal to war efficiency unless means are provided for expansion without the absorption of raw recruits. If the war expansion is to be by raw recruits, the war company will not be a trained company, and it will therefore be impracticable for 3 officers to control 150 men effectively.

2. Even if reserves are available, the peace strength of the company should be sufficient for purposes of instruction. The men who serve in the Army must become trained soldiers, and full Infantry training is not practicable if the peace strength be reduced too far. It is believed that for purposes of instruction the peace strength of the Infantry company should not be reduced below 100 enlisted men.

3. If trained reserves are not available, at least one division of the Regular Army should be maintained at war strength in order to provide an expeditionary force for sudden emergencies.

THE INFANTRY BATTALION.

The war strength of the infantry battalion should be as follows: 1 major, 1 lieutenant (adjutant), 1 sergeant major, 4 companies, 2 ammunition wagons; total commissioned officers, 14; total enlisted, 601.

HEADQUARTERS COMPANY.

In order to avoid unnecessary detachments from the companies and to provide a definite organization for machine guns, scouts, and the regimental wagon train, a headquarters company is recommended for each regiment of infantry, as follows: 1 captain, 1 first lieutenant, 1 second lieutenant, 1 first sergeant, 1 quartermaster sergeant, 2 cooks, 2 musicians, 1 mechanic, 1 horseshoer; total enlisted, 8.

First section; machine-gun detachment.—4 sergeants 8 corporals, 69 privates; total enlisted, 81.

Second section; scouts and orderlies.—1 sergeant, 2 corporals, 21 privates; total enlisted men, 24.

Third section; transportation section.—1 sergeant, 25 privates; total enlisted men, 26. (The relation of these men to such service corps as may be established in the future requires careful consideration.)

Total commissioned, headquarters company, 3; total enlisted, 139.

The three officers of the headquarters company may be provided without increasing the present commissioned strength of the regiment. As will be seen in the organization of the battalion and regimental staffs, three officers are released from staff duty. This gives a captain and two lieutenants for the headquarters company.

THE REGIMENTAL BAND.

The present authorized strength of the band is 28 enlisted. No change is recommended.

THE INFANTRY REGIMENT.

With the changes above proposed the war strength of the Infantry regiment would be as follows:

	Commissioned.	Enlisted.
1 colonel	1
1 lieutenant colonel	1
1 adjutant (captain)	1

The above table gives the approximate organization of the Infantry regiment. The details of organization will be definitely and precisely determined in the experimental Infantry regiment to be assembled in the Central Division during the present summer.

2. THE INFANTRY BRIGADE AND THE DIVISION.

In the Field Service Regulations the Infantry division comprises three brigades of three regiments each. The total Infantry strength in this division is 13,500 (1,500 enlisted per regiment), and the total number of effective riflemen is 10,890. Nine regiments of the size proposed in this report will give a total enlisted strength of 17,775 and 15,084 effective riflemen. As the larger regiment is justified on grounds of economy, the practical question arises as to whether we should retain nine regiments in the division or propose a new division organization. A division of two brigades of three regiments each would give a total Infantry strength of 11,850, or 10,056 effective rifles. But this organization would sacrifice tactical advantages inherent in the three brigades. In the attack of the division there are generally three subdivisions—the frontal attack, the enveloping attack, and the reserve. In a three-brigade division there is a general officer for each subdivision, even though the forces assigned to the several tasks are not kept equal.

Another consideration which determines the strength of the division is the road space. In Europe, where the roads are excellent, an army corps of two divisions, each comprising 12,000 Infantry, is found to be the maximum force that can deploy from column in time to bring all of its troops into battle on the same day. The same corps could not complete its deployment from a single road in the average American terrain until it was too late for the effective employment of a part of the force. The road space of the Field Service Regulations division is so great that two divisions could not effectively deploy from the same road in this manner; and, on the other hand, if one such division is assigned to one road, the road capacity is not fully utilized. But if we retain the nine-regiment division and increase the regimental strength from 1,500 men to 1,975, we increase the number of effective rifles by 38 per cent without increasing the road space by more than 16 per cent. We, therefore, find that a division of three brigades of three regiments each, with 1,975 enlisted men per regiment, is a more economical organization than the division described in the Field Service Regulations, and is better adapted to American terrains. The proportions of Cavalry, Field Artillery, and special troops will now be considered on the assumption that the division is to comprise three Infantry brigades of three regiments each, and that each regiment is to have an enlisted strength of approximately 1,975.

3. CAVALRY.

As far as Cavalry action of the future is concerned, the organization of this arm must facilitate (a) quick and powerful dismounted fire action and (b) equally quick and powerful mounted shock action. At the same time the organization must be so flexible that it will permit the assignment of proper units as divisional Cavalry—first, to meet the requirements of a division as part of a higher tactical organization and, second, with a division or smaller unit acting alone. In addition, the organization must be adapted to the formation of Cavalry brigades and divisions.

The amount of Cavalry assigned any particular command will depend upon many considerations, such as the nature of the particular mission, the character of the terrain, and the composition of the enemy's forces.

Of the Cavalry so assigned, the nature of the operations may require a minimum number of units as divisional Cavalry and a maximum number as independent Cavalry.

Not only must the organization of the Cavalry regiment be so flexible as to meet all these requirements, but the organization decided upon must possess a high degree of mobility, and must be adaptable to varying tactical situations.

The present Cavalry regiment has a total war strength of approximately 1,200 enlisted men. As now organized it is so flexible that it can be formed to meet almost any particular tactical situation. A squadron of four troops can be detached and the remainder will form an appropriate command for a colonel. If a detachment of three troops is all that is required, the remaining troops can be handled as three squadrons of three troops each. If it becomes necessary for the regiment to operate in two equal parts, each part can consist of six troops organized into two squadrons.

The same number of troopers might be organized into a brigade of two regiments, each of six troops of 100 men, or each of four troops of 150 men. A regiment of three squadrons of three troops, each of 100 men, and with a depot troop, has also been proposed.

The regiment now authorized by law has the following maximum strength:

	Commissioned.	Veterinarian.	Enlisted.
Officers (including chaplain)	51
Veterinarians		2
Noncommissioned staff officers			8
Band			28
12 troops (organized as 3 squadrons)			1,200
Total	51	2	1,236

It is believed that the President should be authorized to add an additional or headquarters troop analogous to that proposed for the Infantry regiment and officered in the same manner. If the maximum authorized strength of the headquarters troop is placed as that of the Cavalry troop now authorized, its actual strength can be determined by service requirements as determined experimentally. The headquarters troop should comprise a demolition section in lieu of the scout section of the Infantry headquarters company.

The band might be dispensed with and a trumpet corps organized with the trumpeters of the troops.

With the larger regiment and the road space required for it, a brigade should normally consist of two regiments and a division of three such brigades, the proper auxiliary and special troops being added.

In view of the fact that there has been much discussion throughout the service on the subject of the organization of the Cavalry regiment it is recommended that thorough practical experiments be undertaken to enable the General Staff to try out and decide upon the organization best adapted to meet the special requirements of this arm.

Peace strength of the Cavalry.—The permissible peace strength of Cavalry depends on the means of expansion. If reserves are available, the troops may be kept at the minimum peace strength consistent with proper instruction. If such reserves are not available, a low peace strength will involve a low war strength or serious deterioration in the early stages of a campaign. On the outbreak of war the Cavalry will probably be used in initial strategic operations, and it is therefore very important that it should be capable of full activity without delay, from the very outset.

4. FIELD ARTILLERY.

The types of Field Artillery are classified as "horse," "light," "mountain," and "heavy."

Horse batteries are armed with the 3-inch gun.

Light batteries are armed with the 3-inch gun or the 3.8-inch howitzer.

Mountain batteries are armed with the 2.95 howitzer (to be replaced by the 3-inch howitzer).

Heavy batteries are armed with the 4.7 howitzer, the 4.7 gun, or the 6-inch howitzer.

The 4.7-inch howitzer, drawn by 8 horses, has very considerable mobility and is really intermediate between the light and heavy calibers.

Horse batteries are assigned for service with the Cavalry.

Light or mountain batteries and 4.7-inch howitzer batteries are assigned for service with Infantry divisions.

Heavy batteries (4.7-inch gun and 6-inch howitzer) are assigned as Army Artillery.

The organization of regiments must vary to fit the requirements of the particular types of guns or howitzers to be served. Hence legal enactments governing the organization of the Field Artillery should be worded so as to fix the maximum allowable establishment and leave it to the President to vary the strength of regiments, battalions, and batteries to meet the necessities of service.

The proposed maximum strengths of regiments, battalions, and batteries at war strength are shown below. The numbers of officers, noncommissioned officers, mechanics, trumpeters, cooks, and privates of any particular unit may, under the system suggested above, be varied as circumstances require, provided they are kept below the maximum allowed.

FIELD BATTERY.

[The strength here given is the maximum and is required for heavy batteries only. The strength for batteries of all other types will be less than the maximum strength.]

1 captain, 3 lieutenants (first or second), 1 first sergeant, 1 quartermaster sergeant, 1 stable sergeant, 8 sergeants, 16 corporals, 1 chief mechanic, 7 mechanics, 3 trumpeters, 3 cooks, 149 privates; total commissioned, 4; total enlisted, 190.

Sergeants			2

Privates			12
Mechanics			3
Band			29
Battalions	45		1,761
Total	51	2	1,815

The proposed normal assignment of Field Artillery to units of the other arms is as follows:

For each division (the number of Infantry rifles in the division is increased by 38 per cent and the number of guns by 33⅓ per cent. The proposed divisional artillery comprises 48 field guns and 16 field howitzers):
- Brigade—
  - 1 regiment of 3 battalions—
    - 1 battalion of 3 batteries of four 3-inch guns 12
    - 1 battalion of 3 batteries of four 3-inch guns 12
    - 1 battalion of 2 batteries of four 3.8-inch howitzers .. 8

- Brigade—Continued.
  - 1 regiment of 3 battalions—Continued.
    - 1 battalion of 3 batteries of four 3-inch guns 12
    - 1 battalion of 3 batteries of four 3-inch guns 12
    - 1 battalion of 2 batteries of four 4.7-inch howitzers .. 8
  - 1 ammunition column of 2 battalions.

For each field arm in addition to the divisional artillery:
- 1 regiment of 2 battalions—
  - 1 battalion of 2 batteries of four 4.7-inch guns 8
  - 1 battalion of 2 batteries of four 6-inch howitzers 8
- 1 ammunition column of 1 battalion.

For each Cavalry division:
- 1 regiment of 3 battalions of 2 batteries of 4 guns each 24
- 1 ammunition column of 1 battalion.

The approximate war strengths proposed for each of the regiments above referred to are:

Divisional artillery, 1 regiment, 47 officers and 1,438 men; 1 regiment, 47 officers and 1,486 men. (The number of officers here given are based on the proposed number of guns or howitzer batteries in each regiment. The difference between these numbers and the total commissioned strength, 51, is the number available in each case for duty with ammunition columns and other special Artillery service.)

Army Artillery, 1 regiment, 28 officers and 854 men.

Horse Artillery, 1 regiment, 39 officers and 1,160 men.

Thus the proposed maximum legal strength is not closely approached in any case. On the other hand, the maximum strength of batteries is very closely approached in the case of Heavy Artillery. As the exact combinations of batteries into battalions and regiments which it may be necessary to make in the future can not be foreseen, the law should show merely the superior limit and leave to the Executive the power to utilize the available strength in the most useful way.

5. AMMUNITION SERVICE.

The personnel of this service is charged with receiving ammunition from the line of communication troops, transporting it up to the neighborhood of the combatant troops, and distributing it to the various combat trains of Infantry, Cavalry, and Field Artillery.

To insure the combatant troops deployed over a wide territory being promptly and regularly supplied with ammunition, an effective organization of this service is requisite. It will be necessary to establish close communication with the various commanders so as to learn what supplies are needed, to reconnoiter the country and find the best avenues of approach, to regulate the movements of elements of the train so as to meet the varying needs of different parts of the line of battle, and to maintain sure communication between all the elements of the train and with the supply depots. With a view to coordinating all these various duties and activities, it is proposed to charge the Field Artillery with this service and provide the necessary staff and organizations for the purpose.

To this end the law should empower the President to raise ammunition battalions, in the proportion of one per authorized Field Artillery regiment, whose maximum authorized strength should be that of a Field Artilery battalion. A certain personnel should be provided in each regiment as constituting the nucleus of this ammunition service, the same to be transferred to the appropriate divisional or Army ammunition column on mobilization. No other transfers should be made from the regiments; the additional personnel should be secured from reservists or by recruitment. To organize promptly an efficient ammunition service according to this plan, a satisfactorily working reserve system must be in existence.

The regiments of divisional artillery, as proposed above, have only two batteries in the howitzer battalion. The third batteries of the howitzer battalions may be designated as the nucleus of the divisional ammunition service, their personnel to be transferred to the ammunition column on mobilization. In the heavy artillery and the horse artillery the third battery of each battalion may similarly be designated as the nucleus of the appropriate ammunition column.

In Appendix II hereto attached the organization of the Field Artillery and of the ammunition service is discussed in greater detail.

Peace strength of Artillery.—The permissible peace strength of Artillery depends on the means of expansion. If reserves are available, the batteries may be kept at the minimum peace strength consistent with proper instruction. Much of the Artillery personnel in times of war is employed in the transportation and distribution of ammunition. With adequate reserves this service may be kept at greatly reduced strength without loss of efficiency.

6. COMPONENTS OF THE DIVISION AND THE FIELD ARMY.

Based upon the organization of Infantry, Cavalry, and Field Artillery above indicated, the complete division should comprise the following units:

Division headquarters.
3 Infantry brigades of 3 regiments each.
1 regiment of Cavalry.
1 brigade of Field Artillery (2 regiments).
* 1 pioneer battalion of Engineers.
* 1 field company of Signal troops.
* Sanitary troops organized as field hospitals and ambulance companies.
* 1 ammunition column.
* 1 supply train.
* 1 pack train.

EXTRA-DIVISIONAL TROOPS.

In addition to the organizations comprised in the divisions the following additional units should be available for assignment to each field army of three divisions:

Cavalry: Three or more brigades to be employed as independent Cavalry brigades; or two or more Cavalry brigades may be combined with proper auxiliaries to form a Cavalry division. (This provision of extra-divisional Cavalry applies to a field army comprising the regular troops and regarded as available at any time as an expeditionary force. The quota for additional field armies of Volunteers or other citizen soldiery should be not more than one Cavalry brigade to each three divisions.)

1 brigade of Infantry.
1 regiment of Heavy Artillery.
* 1 ponton battalion of Engineers (bridge train).
* 1 field army company of Signal troops (including wireless detachments).
* 1 base line telegraph company of Signal troops.
* 1 aeroplane company or detachment.
* 1 supply train.
* 1 ammunition column.

* Sanitary troops (additional field hospitals and ambulance companies, with the elements of the evacuation service).

The organizations marked (*) above have been tentatively outlined in the Field Service Regulations of 1910; but as changes are recommended in the fundamental units of Infantry and Field Artillery, it will be necessary to revise the organization of these auxiliaries to conform to the changes proposed in the combatant elements of the division. If the general policy of organization proposed in this report be approved, it is recommended that the General Staff be instructed to recommend a reorganization of the auxiliary services within the division in conformity with the following general principles:

(a) The divisions should habitually include the normal proportions of the three combatant arms and the special troops; that is, there should be a safe minimum of auxiliaries determined by average conditions.

(b) In addition to the divisions, there should be a proper reservoir of extra-divisional troops.

(c) When it is desired to form an expeditionary force for any particular purpose a field army should be organized by taking two or more divisions and adding the Army headquarters and such extra-divisional auxiliaries as may be appropriate for the particular terrain and mission.

(d) If one division is approximately sufficient for the particular expedition, the normal proportions can be modified, if necessary, by attaching such additional auxiliaries as may be required, or by detaching such auxiliaries as may be redundant in the particular situation.

(e) The proportions of auxiliaries in field armies and expeditionary forces should depend upon the mission of the particular force, the terrain in which it is to operate, and the character of opposition expected. Appropriate and sufficient auxiliaries aid the fighting power of the force, but redundant auxiliaries reduce its mobility, increase the difficulties of supply and administration, disturb the balance of the fighting team, and actually weaken the force by requiring additional measures for the security of the surplus units which in this case become burdensome impedimenta.

(f) The auxiliaries in the division should, therefore, be only those that will always be required in it. Exceptional units or exceptional proportions should be attached from the extra-divisional reservoir when needed.

In addition to the tactical reasons for the proposed policy which are given in paragraph (e) above, there is an important economic principle involved. If the division includes all of the auxiliary units which are required for every possible contingency, it will include many noncombatants and much impedimenta which it will not require for normal contingencies. These extra or reserve units must, of course, be available when needed, but it is more economical to retain them in rear of the Army as a reserve, where they can be forwarded to such divisions as may temporarily require them. But these extra units will never be required at the same time by all of the divisions of a field army. They should normally be in the rear of the field army, where the field army commander can forward them to the division or divisions which may require them at any particular time. Sound economic principle requires that the maximum fighting power should be developed for any sum that may be appropriated for military purposes. This requires the maximum possible investment in combatant troops and the minimum possible investment in noncombatant troops. The cost of noncombatant auxiliaries can be reduced to a minimum by concentrating them so far as practical in an extra-divisional reserve. To give each division the full quota required for all contingencies will increase the cost of the whole field army and will reduce the mobility and fighting efficiency of the several divisions.

VII.

The relation of promotion to organization.

The organization of the Army should be determined by strategical, political, and economic considerations, with the sole view of serving the public interest. In the past, however, questions of relative promotion have largely influenced the result. Proper promotion of the officers is essential in any military system, and parity of promotion under similar conditions is necessary if we are to have an effective force. Human nature is such that all officers desire their share of promotion. The result has been, however, that these questions of relative promotion have affected the proper consideration of all questions of organization. If an effort is made to secure an increase deemed necessary in any one arm, officers of the other arms are liable to oppose it unless by other increases, perhaps necessary and perhaps not, a parity of promotion is received. While, therefore, the question of promotion and rank is one that all officers are rightly interested in, it has interfered, and will continue to interfere, with any scientific and economical reorganization plans. It is therefore considered an absolutely necessary preliminary to any reorganization of the mobile army to place promotion on an equitable basis independent of organization.

In order to accomplish this result in the simplest and most equitable manner, and with a minimum disturbance of existing conditions, it is suggested that the following rules governing rank and promotion should be incorporated in the military law of the United States:

1. Rank and eligibility to command in any grade of the Army below that of brigadier general shall be determined by length of continuous commissioned service as an officer of the Regular Army. The date of commencement of continuous service in the case of any officer shall be the date of rank given in his first commission, and it shall be known as the "date of precedence." In each grade below that of brigadier general all officers of the Regular Army shall be arranged in the order of their dates of precedence, and those originally appointed with the same date of rank in the order of precedence at the time of their appointments: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall assign constructive dates of precedence to all officers of the following classes who occupy anomalous positions on the lineal lists of their several arms.

(a) Those officers of Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery, and Infantry who were appointed under the act of February 2, 1901, and who had served as commissioned officers in the Regular Army or Volunteers prior to such appointment.

(b) Those officers who have lost rank by reason of the sentence of court-martial or as the result of examination for promotion.

(c) Those officers who have voluntarily transferred from one arm of the line to another or from a staff department to an arm of the line.

Each officer of class (a) above excepted shall be assigned a constructive date of precedence which will place him in the same position relative to officers of his own arm or corps as he now occupies on the lineal list of his arm or corps, and with reference to officers of other arms or corps whose dates of precedence may lie between that of the officer next above him and the officer next below him in his own arm or corps, he shall take precedence in accordance with total length of commissioned service in the Regular Army and Volunteers, and his constructive date of precedence shall be fixed accordingly; and for this purpose the date of acceptance of commission shall be regarded as the date of commencement of service of officers of the Regular Army and of staff officers of volunteers appointed by the President, and the date of muster into service shall be regarded as the date of commencement of service of line officers of Volunteers.

Each officer of class (b) and (c) above excepted shall be assigned a constructive date of precedence which will place his position for rank and eligibility to command next below the officer who immediately precedes him on the lineal list of his own arm or corps on the date of the passage of the act.

2. The order of promotion in each arm, department, or corps shall remain as now provided by law, subject to the exception described in paragraph 3 below, which applies to original vacancies in the Cavalry, Field Artillery, and Infantry.

3. Whenever any part of the Infantry, Cavalry, or Field Artillery is increased or the number of officers in any of these arms is increased the original vacancies above the grade of second lieutenant due to the increase shall be filled from the next lower grade in the three arms, the number of officers promoted from each arm to be proportional to the number of officers of that grade in the three arms as nearly as may be practicable: Provided, That the order of promotion in any arm shall be in the order of the lineal list of that arm, as now provided by law: Provided further, That, so far as practicable, officers shall be promoted in their own arm: Provided further, That when any officer is nominated for promotion into an arm other than his own he may waive such promotion, and in this case the vacancy shall pass consecutively to the officers next below him in the lineal list of his own arm: And provided also, That whenever any officer is promoted to another arm under the provisions of this rule his position for subsequent promotion in that arm shall be fixed by his position on the list for rank and eligibility to command as determined by the date of precedence defined in paragraph 1 above.

4. Whenever any part of the Infantry, Cavalry, or Field Artillery is reduced or the total number of officers in one or more of the three arms is reduced the surplus officers should not be absorbed in the arm or arms in which the reduction occurs, but should be prorated for absorption throughout the three arms: Provided, That whenever any officer is transferred to another arm under the provisions of this rule his lineal position for promotion in that arm shall be fixed by his position on the list for rank and eligibility to command as determined by the date of precedence defined in paragraph 1 above.

COMMENTS ON THE PROPOSED RULES FOR RELATIVE RANK AND PROMOTION.

Rule 1. This rule does not affect promotion in any way, but provides that all officers shall take precedence in their respective grades in the order of their actual seniority, and not according to the date of last commission. On July 23 last Capt. W——, of the Cavalry, was promoted to the grade of major after 23 years 1 month and 12 days of commissioned service. Maj. W—— is junior in rank to Maj. R——, of the Medical Corps, who, on the date of Maj. W——'s promotion, had served 9 years 8 months and 23 days. Maj. R——'s seniority is based on the fact that his commission as major antedates that of Maj. W—— by 9 days, and this notwithstanding the fact that Maj. W—— had served as a commissioned officer more than twice as long as Maj. R——. The proposed rule would not expedite Maj. W——'s promotion, nor would it retard that of Maj. R——. It would simply provide that after arriving in the same grade their precedence should depend upon actual seniority. Maj. R——'s rapid promotion has been due to special provisions of law, under which medical officers enter the Army with the grade of first lieutenant and are promoted to the grade of captain in five years after first commission. (The period is now three years.) These provisions are designed to compensate for the fact that such officers must acquire a special professional education before they can enter the Army. The proposed rule for relative rank would not interfere with such special rules of promotion, but would simply provide that after arriving in the same grade officers should take precedence in the order of actual seniority.

Among Maj. W——'s seniors under the present rule of procedure is Maj. C——, of the Coast Artillery, whose seniority is based on the fact that he was promoted to the grade of major 16 days before Maj. W——'s promotion, notwithstanding the fact that he was actually Maj. W——'s junior as a commissioned officer by nine years.

The difference in length of service in this case is due to the fact that under present conditions promotion in the Cavalry is relatively slow, while promotion in the Coast Artillery is relatively rapid. The proposed rule of seniority would not affect promotion in either arm, but would simply tend to adjust relative rank on an equitable basis when officers arrive in the same grade. Relative rank determines the right to command, the right to choice of quarters, and precedence on boards and other duty, where officers of the different arms are required to serve together. Among officers in the same grade seniority for the purposes above indicated should be determined by actual seniority.

Rule 3.—This rule applies only to the Cavalry, Infantry, and Field Artillery. These are the combatant arms of the mobile army, and the rule is proposed in order to eliminate all questions of individual promotion from the problem of reorganization of the mobile army. With this rule in effect it is expected that questions of legislation affecting the mobile army can be considered purely on their merits from the standpoint of the public interest.

The application of the foregoing principles will tend to correct the present arbitrary inequalities in relative rank and promotion in the several branches of the Army. But it does not constitute a final solution of the promotion question.

At present there is no sufficient incentive to efficiency. The laggard and the hard-working, enthusiastic officer are advanced with equal steps and according to one cast-iron rule of promotion. It is important, on the one hand, to provide means for disposing of officers who for one reason or another have lost their usefulness; and it is necessary, on the other hand, to insure officers of ability arriving at command rank at a time of life when their usefulness is at a maximum. In either case action should be based upon the officer's record of achievement.

The essentials necessary to the ultimate solution of this problem are:

1. To put the Army on such an improved basis of organization and training that a common doctrine as to standards of military efficiency may be recognized throughout the service and applied to the professional records of all officers.

2. To provide positive and equitable means for advancing, retarding, or eliminating officers according to their several merits.

The difficulties of a practical solution of this problem are recognized. The matter should be made the subject of most careful and deliberate study in the future, and no step should be taken without adequate safeguards against the intrusion of favoritism and other abuses.

VIII.

An initial tactical organization for the mobile army, with a program of gradual expansion into a field army.

1. THE TROOPS AVAILABLE AFTER PROVIDING FOR THE FOREIGN GARRISONS AND THE POLICY OF ORGANIZATION PROPOSED.

It was shown in Chapter II of this report that after the minimum requirements of the foreign garrisons have been provided for the following organizations of the mobile army will remain in the United States: 16 regiments of Infantry, 11½ regiments of Cavalry, 2 regiments of Field and Mountain Artillery, 1 regiment of Horse Artillery, 8 companies of Engineers, 2 field companies of signal troops, 4 companies of signal troops (other than field companies), 1 field hospital, 1 ambulance company.

It is important that this force should receive a tactical organization as a mobile army, even though it should remain incomplete. It is also important that organization tables should indicate the successive increments by means of which the force should be expanded if it should be the pleasure of Congress to form it ultimately into a well-balanced field army. The organization should favor the prompt mobilization of all or part of the mobile army as an expeditionary force. The distribution and administration should also be adapted to the effective use of the Army as a nucleus for the organization and training of national guard and volunteer forces.

These conditions can best be met by organizing a skeleton or nuclear division in each of the three territorial departments. After providing the divisional Cavalry for each division, the remaining Cavalry should be formed into Cavalry brigades of two or three regiments each. When the tactical organizations thus formed have been completed further expansion should be with a view of dividing the central territorial region into two, each containing a complete tactical division with the proper proportion of extra-divisional troops. In considering the details of this organization it is necessary to bear in mind that while an ultimate segregation of the mobile Army into actual brigade commands is contemplated under the policy proposed by the Secretary of War, such segregation can not be accomplished at once, and during the period of transition the organization must be such as to meet the actual distribution of the mobile Army. The essential object sought is to provide an organization in peace which will continue to exist in war. The faulty distribution of the Army increases the practical difficulties of the problem, but can not be accepted as an argument for adopting a peace organization which must be replaced by a different extemporized organization on the outbreak of war.

2. THE PROPOSED ORGANIZATION OF THE SKELETON FIELD ARMY.

The proposed organization of the units of the mobile Army after providing for the foreign garrisons is shown in Table I, which follows. The number of organizations shown in the table does not correspond exactly wth the numbers now present in the United States, because certain regiments to be relieved from the Philippines have not returned and certain other organizations destined for Panama and Oahu have not yet been dispatched on foreign service. The actual number of organizations within the United States and within the several territorial departments are therefore subject to fluctuation until the foreign garrisons are established.

The adoption of a peace organization like that shown in Table I will result in great decentralization. If it should be desired to assemble an expeditionary force at some place, as Galveston, no extemporization would be necessary. None of the divisions are complete, but a full division could be assembled promptly by a few brief orders like the following:

1. To the commanding general, Central Department, "Assemble the Second Division at Galveston."

2. To the commanding general, Eastern Department, "Send the First Brigade, First Division, to Galveston for duty with the Second Division."

Such simplicity is the result of decentralization and would be possible because there is no difference, except as to strength, between the proposed peace organization and the war organization. The preparation of mobilization and transportation plans would be a part of the routine duty of the several brigade and division commanders. At present such a force as this could not be assembled without complicated and difficult extemporization, and when assembled each of its general officers would be a stranger to his command and its problems of administration.

TABLE I.—The skeleton field army as organized with existing troops.

First Division.	Second Division.	Third Division.	Army troops.[1]
(To be stationed in the Eastern Department.) First Brigade.—3 regiments of infantry. Second Brigade.—1 regiment of infantry. Divisional Artillery.—1 battalion of field artillery. Divisional Cavalry.—(1 regiment less 1 squadron.)[2] Engineers.—Provisional pioneer battalion (2 companies). Signal troops.—None available. Sanitary troops.—No field hospitals or ambulance companies available. (For the formation of a cavalry division or independent cavalry brigades, and to provide extra-divisional auxiliaries.) Cavalry.—9 regiments (formed in brigade in sections of 2 or 3 regiments). Horse Artillery.—1 regiment. Engineers.—Provisional pontoon battalion (2 companies). Signal troops.—None available. Sanitary troops.—No field hospitals or ambulance companies available.

[1] The Army troops to be distributed in the three territorial departments.

[2] 1 squadron at Panama to be taken from one of the divisional Cavalry regiments. For the purposes of this table it is assumed that this squadron is taken from the First Division.

NOTE.—In minor wars where the command of the sea is not involved or in a more serious war after the command of the sea has been definitely secured by our Navy the troops of the Coast Artillery may be counted upon to reenforce the mobile army. In order to meet this contingency the peace organization and training of the Coast Artillery should include preparation for employment as auxiliary organizations of Siege Artillery, Infantry, and other services. For purposes of field training such provisional organizations as may be formed in the Eastern Department should have opportunities for field training with the First Division. The provisional organizations formed in the Western Department should likewise train with the Third Division.

3. FIRST INCREMENT OF THE SKELETON FIELD ARMY.

The field army shown in Table I is incomplete in every particular, but it is the best organization that can be effected with the forces available. It is believed that the first increment of the Army that Congress may authorize should be applied in such a way as to give the three skeleton divisions a uniform proportion of the several arms. Table II shows the improvement in the organization that would result from adding the following organizations as the first future increment of the mobile army:

Two regiments of Infantry (to complete second brigade, first division).

Six battalions of Field Artillery (one to each regiment now existing) (a).

One field company of Signal troops with sufficient additional personnel to form the nucleus of the field army aero and wireless service (b).

Five field hospitals (c).

Five ambulance companies (c).

(a) This would result in gaining one regiment of Field Artillery for home service, as after the change two 3-battalion regiments would replace three 2-battalion regiments on foreign service.

(b) In the organization of the Signal Corps every effort should be made to utilize as many as possible of the enlisted men now employed on technical duties and who are not included in field companies in time of peace. The plans for war expansion should also contemplate the fullest use of civilian aero operators, telegraphers, and other experts. These questions should be considered in connection with the revision of the Field Service Regulations.

(c) Every effort should be made to provide the necessary sanitary units for field service, but as much of their personnel as possible should be mobilized from the peace personnel on duty at posts. As the concentration policy progresses a greater percentage of Hospital Corps men will be released from post duty on mobilization. The plans should also be based on the idea of a war expansion through the absorption of civilians whose ordinary occupations are analogous to those of the Hospital Corps. The peace strength of all noncombatant troops should be kept at a minimum consistent with proper peace service and effective war expansion.

[1] See Table I.

[2] The proposed Artillery organization furnishes a cadre for the ammunition column. The details of expansion will depend on whether reservists are provided. If not, the expansion must be by recruitment. In either event detailed plans must be worked out.

[3] The cadre of the supply columns should be furnished by such service corps as may be authorized. The details of expansion must be worked out in connection with the service corps.

[4] The details of organization to be worked out by the General Staff with the Signal Corps during the revision of the Field Service Regulations.

4. SUBSEQUENT INCREMENTS OF THE FIELD ARMY.

After forming the balanced skeleton field army shown in Table II, the next increments should successively expand the skeleton divisions of the field army into complete divisions. The second increment, necessary to complete one of the divisions,[1] is as follows:

1 brigade of Infantry (3 regiments).
1 regiment of Field Artillery.
1 pioneer company of Engineers (to complete the divisional battalion).
1 or more additional ambulance companies and field hospitals, the number to depend upon a determination of the number proper for the division and the number proper for the extra-divisional reservoir.

The third and fourth increments would be identical with the second increment and would each complete another division.

The fifth increment should complete the quota of Army troops necessary to furnish an auxiliary division if the whole mobile Army should be employed as a field army or expeditionary force. The additional units are as follows:

1 regiment of heavy artillery (a).
1 brigade of Infantry (3 regiments).
1 company of Engineers (to complete the field army pontoon battalion) and appropriate engineer units for the Cavalry division.
Field Army Signal units (organization completed).
Sanitary troops (such additional ambulance companies, field hospitals, and evacuation hospitals as may be found necessary).

NOTE.—(a) Until a regiment of field-army heavy artillery can be provided one or more batteries or battalions of the divisional artillery will be equipped with the heavy types.

The complete field army with three divisions and army auxiliary troops as it would be organized after the fifth increment is shown in Table III.

TABLE III.—The field army with three divisions and Army troops complete as organized after the fifth increment.

[1] See Table I.

With the sixth increment the fourth division should come into being, and successive increments should complete it. What further increments may be necessary can not be foretold, but it is certain that the future military needs of the country, as they are understood to-day, can not be met by a mobile force of less than four divisions, and this is the goal toward which all effort should be directed.

But in the preparation of this report every effort has been made to separate the question of organization from the question of possible increase. Tactical organization should be adopted without reference to possible increases, and such increases as may be authorized in the future should be applied to the development of a consistent tactical plan.

5. THE NUMBER OF GENERAL OFFICERS REQUIRED BY THE TACTICAL ORGANIZATION.

Brigadier generals.—Modern tactical organization requires a homogeneous unit higher than the regiment. This unit is the brigade, and its commander should be a brigadier general selected as a general rule from the arm which he commands. The number of brigadier generals of the mobile army should therefore be based on the number of regiments. For each arm there should be at least one brigadier general for each three regiments or major fraction thereof. With the present strength of the Army the quota of brigadier generals of the mobile army should therefore be as follows:

	Regiments.	Brigadier generals.
Infantry	30	10
Cavalry	15	5
Field Artillery	6	2
Total	51	17

This number of brigadier generals is based on the present peace strength of the mobile army and should be increased in proportion to future increments of the Army. In time of war there should be a brigadier general for each organized brigade.

The number of brigadier generals required for the Coast Artillery organization is four, viz, one for each Coast Artillery inspection and one as chief of Coast Artillery.

Major generals.—The number of major generals should likewise be based upon the commands appropriate for such officers. The appropriate peace commands for major generals are as follows:

Territorial departments in the United States	3
Philippine Department	1
Hawaiian Department	1
Panama Department	1
Total major generals	6

In time of war there should be a major general for each organized division.

General officers required for duty on the General Staff and for other purposes.—The number of general officers authorized by law for detail to the General Staff should be in addition to those above enumerated for assignment to military commands. The additional general officers so required should be added in the grade of brigadier general. This will permit the assignment of general officers of either grade to the General Staff without reducing the total number available as military commanders. When a major general is detached from his appropriate command for detail to the General Staff, the brigadier general assigned to the military command so vacated should have the temporary rank, pay, and allowances of major general during his continuance in such advanced command.

6. ADDITIONAL OFFICERS REQUIRED FOR DUTIES OTHER THAN REGIMENTAL.

When additional officers are required for duty with the citizen soldiery, or for other military duty peculiarly related to their respective arms of the service, the numbers of such officers allotted to each arm should be based upon the actual requirements of the arm and not upon a pro rata between the several arms. The number of Infantry officers required for duty with the National Guard depends upon the requirements of the National Guard infantry. Similarly the number of Cavalry officers required depends upon the needs of the National Guard cavalry. The relative numbers required from the two arms has no relation to the fact that the Regular Infantry comprises twice as many officers as the Regular Cavalry. It is recommended, therefore, that the number of such additional officers as may be authorized for purely tactical purposes in the future be based upon the actual needs of the several arms, with the understanding that the original vacancies due to any increase in the number of such extra regimental officers in the Infantry, Cavalry, or Field Artillery be prorated among the three arms according to the principles governing the filling of original vacancies as outlined in Chapter VII of this report.

But when additional officers are required for administrative duties not peculiarly related to any one arm, the total number of such officers should be prorated among the several arms as at present.

Whenever the number of additional officers allotted to any arm is increased in any manner, the grades of the new officers should be so allotted as to keep the ratios between the numbers of officers in the several grades, as near as may be, the same in the Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery, and Infantry.

IX.

Raising and organizing the national volunteer forces.

1. LIMITATIONS UPON THE AVAILABILITY OF THE STATE MILITIA AS A NATIONAL FORCE.

The Constitution provides that Congress shall have power—

"to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion."

And, further—

"to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."

Under these provisions Congress passed the act of January 21, 1903, commonly known as the Dick bill. This act superseded practically all the militia laws on the statute books. It has since been amended by the act of May 27, 1908, and the act of April 21, 1910. Under the provisions of these laws the militia has been organized, uniformed, and equipped, and the President is authorized to employ the organized portion for the three purposes specified in the Constitution. Under the operation of these laws the general efficiency of the Organized Militia has been greatly improved, but no acts of Congress can extend the scope of its employment as militia or modify the restricted fundamental law upon which the whole militia structure is based.

The Regular Army is organized under the general and plenary power of Congress "to raise and support armies," and it can be used both at home and abroad for any national purpose. The militia may be employed to support the Regular Army for the limited purposes mentioned in the Constitution, but it can not be employed for the varied purposes for which a national army may be required—for such purposes as our own history shows it is likely to be needed.

After the War of 1812 it seemed to be accepted as a settled policy that under existing constitutional limitations the militia should not be regarded as available for general military purposes.

In the Mexican War the Regular Army, supported by a volunteer army of national troops, achieved a series of victories unmarred by a single defeat. The Battle of Buena Vista, fought at a time when nearly all the regular troops had been dispatched to take part in the campaign under Gen. Scott against the City of Mexico, was a triumph for the volunteers. A force of some 12,000 militia was called out for three months in the first stages of the war, but they were returned to their homes without having fired a shot.

The Civil War opened with a call for 75,000 militia to serve for three months. The disaster which ensued at Bull Run practically put an end to the use of militia during the war. A great volunteer army of citizen soldiery was called into being, which prosecuted the war as a national force.

After the Civil War there was a great development of Organized Militia throughout the country. Although national support was not liberally given, it was recognized that these State organizations furnished a valuable school of military training. When the Spanish War broke out a volunteer army was again organized, and under a provision of the law existing militia organizations were permitted to volunteer as complete units. These volunteer organizations were created under the power of Congress to raise and support armies. The militia upon volunteering completely lost its militia status as far as the Federal Government was concerned. The forces thus created were therefore available for general military purposes, and they were employed in Porto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippine Islands.

Under the legislation of 1898 regiments made up from militia organizations were received into the Federal service as volunteers, and with other new regiments of volunteers were formed into brigades, divisions, and Army corps. When a regiment or smaller organization volunteered as a body the governor of the State was authorized to appoint the militia officers of these units into corresponding grades in the same organizations when they were received into the service of the United States as part of the Volunteer Army; but the higher Army units, the brigades, divisions, and Army corps, were Federal units organized by the President and commanded by officers under his commission. Some of these general officers were appointed from the Regular Army, some were distinguished veterans of a former war, and some were appointed from the militia officers who volunteered from the States. But they all became Federal officers and were responsible to the constitutional Commander in Chief. This was in harmony with the national policy adopted in the Mexican War and continued throughout the War of 1861–1865.

The volunteer act of 1898 was drawn in haste and contained many defects, but in these two particulars it was based on our national experience and erected solidly upon the Constitution. It called for an army, a force that could be used at home or abroad, in attack or defense, and for general military purposes; it therefore did not attempt to use a force which the Constitution had restricted to three limited uses. It called for a National Army, and therefore its fundamental army units were Federal units. It did not favor repeating the folly committed in 1812, when we attempted to conquer Canada with groups of allied forces, rather than with a cohesive National Army.

The volunteers of 1898, like the volunteers of 1861, were citizen soldiers, but they were not militia. Our Constitution and our history alike confirm the dictum that citizen soldiers may be employed successfully for general military purposes, but that organized as militia they may not.

In the militia legislation of 1903 and 1908 we have departed from the sound policy based on the experience of 1812, 1846, 1861, and 1898. It is true that the Organized Militia of to-day is a more highly trained force than the militia of our early history, but the same constitutional limitations as to use and control prevent its full development as an effective national force, so long as it maintains its legal character as militia.

The present militia policy is erected on the theory that the militia may be used for general military purposes as militia. It provides that it shall enter the service as militia and remain militia, and yet contains the provision that it may serve either within or without the territory of the United States. With reference to this provision of the militia law, the Attorney General writes as follows in reply to a question from the Secretary of War:

"It is true that the act of January 21, 1903, as amended by the act of May 27, 1908 (35 Stat., pt. 1, 399), provides:

"'That whenever the President calls forth the Organized Militia of any State or Territory, or of the District of Columbia, to be employed in the service of the United States, he may specify in his call the period for which such service is required, and the militia so called shall continue to serve during the term so specified, either within or without the territory of the United States, unless sooner relieved by order of the President.'

"But this must be read in view of the constitutional power of Congress to call forth the militia only to suppress insurrection, repel invasion, or to execute the laws of the Union. Congress can not, by its own enactment, enlarge the power conferred upon it by the Constitution; and if this provision were construed to authorize Congress to use the Organized Militia for any other than the three purposes specified it would be unconstitutional. This provision applies only to cases where, under the Constitution, said militia may be used outside of our own borders and was, doubtless, inserted as a matter of precaution and to prevent the possible recurrence of what took place in our last war with Great Britain, when portions of the militia refused to obey orders to cross the Canadian frontier.

"I think that the constitutional provision here considered not only affords no warrant for the use of the militia by the General Government, except to suppress insurrection, repel invasion, or to execute the laws of the Union, but, by its careful enumeration of the three occasions or purposes for which the militia may be used, it forbids such use for any other purpose."

The opinion of the Attorney General in full is attached to this report as Appendix III.

We are thus brought squarely face to face with the problem of how we are to get the forces which we may need for purposes more general than those to which the Constitution restricts the use of militia. And this raises the whole question of how we are to go about providing for the great national volunteer force which in time of stress our country may need.

The Constitution provides two means whereby the National Government may draw upon the great body of potential national volunteers—directly under the power to raise and support armies, indirectly under the militia clause. The first power is unrestricted, the second definitely restricted. Such troops as may be raised under the latter power must undergo a change of status before they can be employed for general military purposes. The procedure necessary for developing a national force under each of these two powers is discussed below.

A. UNDER THE POWER TO RAISE AND SUPPORT ARMIES.

The "power to raise and support armies" is construed as follows in Tarble's Case, 13 Wallace, 408:

"Field, J.: Now, among the powers assigned to the National Government, is the power 'to raise and support armies' and the power 'to provide for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.' The execution of these powers falls within the line of its duties, and its control over the subject is plenary and exclusive. It can determine, without question from any State authority, how the armies shall be raised, whether by voluntary enlistment or forced draft, the age at which the soldier shall be received and the period for which he shall be taken, the compensation he shall be allowed, and the service to which he shall be assigned. And it can provide the rules for the government and regulation of the forces after they are raised, define what shall constitute military offenses, and prescribe their punishment. No interference with the execution of this power of the National Government in the formation, organization, and government of its armies by any State officials could be permitted without greatly impairing the efficiency, if it did not utterly destroy, this branch of the public service."

In view of this language of the Supreme Court it would seem that Congress could organize a company or a battalion or a regiment of citizen soldiers in every congressional district if it chose to do so. It could limit the employment of the force to time of war only, or to other contingencies determined by itself. It could fix the period of instruction at 10 days a year, or 20 days a year, or 1 hour per week, or any other time that might be desirable. It could regulate the appointment of officers and provide for the voluntary transfer of officers and enlisted men from the present Organized Militia to the national force. It could organize battalions and regiments of the three arms and all of the auxiliaries that might be required for war purposes, and could combine them into properly proportioned divisions and field armies. It could organize it definitely as a territorial army uniformly distributed throughout the Union with all of the machinery of mobilization, concentration, and supply organized in time of peace. Congress could place any desired limit of strength upon its national army of citizen soldiers, or it could adopt the logical ideal of voluntary military service, and provide facilities for the military training of all patriotic young men who might volunteer to receive it.

By such means we would be enabled gradually to develop our military resources according to a definite and logical plan. Instead of trying to force upon the militia two duties which under the limitations of the Constitution are more or less incompatible we would recognize things as they are, and provide for two forces, each having its special function. This would afford obvious advantages to all concerned; the National Government would know upon what forces it could count; the States could proportion their forces to local needs; and individuals would have the choice of the particular kind of service they preferred; that is, State service with limited war liability, or war service only, under the National Government.

B. UNDER THE MILITIA CLAUSES OF THE CONSTITUTION.

But while a national citizen soldiery organized "under the power to raise and support armies" is the most direct and the most complete solution of our problem, it must be recognized that the immediate provision of such a force involves serious practical difficulties. It is unquestionably true that the present Organized Militia can not be employed for general military purposes, and that under the present law it can not be effectively trained for war as a homogeneous national force. On the other hand, it is a force actually in being and one composed largely of officers and men who have volunteered for military training because they desire to serve as soldiers in the event of war. The Organized Militia in short constitutes an existing organization. As it stands it is unsuited for national military uses. The question is, Can this impediment be removed?

Congress may organize and discipline the militia, but must leave to the States the appointment of its officers and the authority to train the force according to the discipline prescribed by Congress. Congress is also authorized to govern the militia when it is actually in the service of the United States. Congress may therefore prescribe any peace organization, discipline, or system of training for the militia which does not deprive the States of the following reserved powers:

1. To appoint the officers.
2. To train the forces according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.
3. To govern the militia when not actually in the service of the United States.

The practical question, then, is, Can Congress, under these limitations, convert the Organized Militia into an effective military force and utilize it for general war purposes?

It is believed that the modified militia pay bill recently prepared by the Secretary of War, after consultation with the National Militia Board, furnishes the basis for a practical solution of this problem. (A copy of the bill is hereto attached as Appendix IV.)

The bill provides that officers and enlisted men of the National Guard who conform to certain standards of efficiency to be prescribed by the Secretary of War shall be entitled to Federal pay. In order to be entitled to pay a man must be qualified for military service under the standards to be prescribed by the Federal Government, and he must likewise be a member of a military command of standard organization, strength, and efficiency.

The bill also provides that all organizations and individuals receiving such pay may, in certain emergencies and with the consent of Congress, be transferred to and incorporated with the Army of the United States, and when so transferred such organizations and individuals shall be subject to the laws and regulations governing the Armies of the United States.

It is believed that such militia organizations as qualify for pay under the terms of the bill would be available for general military uses, because when transferred to and incorporated with the Army of the United States they would cease to be militia and would be as fully under the control of Congress as is the Regular Army. It is obvious that no individual or organization of the militia should be the recipient of pay from the Federal Government unless he or it is fully available for general military purposes. It is also believed that the enactment of the bill would give the Federal Government an effective influence over the organization, training, and discipline of the Organized Militia without invading the constitutional powers of the States.

The power to appoint officers would still be reserved to the States, but only those appointees would receive Federal pay who are found fit to perform a definite Federal function and who are obligated to perform that function. The power to train the militia would be reserved to the States, but Federal pay would go only to that part of the militia which is actually trained and prepared for incorporation in the organized war army of the Nation. Under this policy the Government would not extend its influence over all of the militia in a State, but only over that portion which voluntarily engages to form a part of the national war army of citizen soldiery, and even over that portion the Federal influence would be indirect and without encroachment upon the powers reserved to the States by the Constitution.

A militiaman transferred to the Army of the United States under the provisions of the proposed bill should be required to serve until the expiration of his term of service or until a man could be trained to replace him in the event his term of enlistment expired soon after his transfer. The bill should therefore give the Federal Government the right to extend the term of enlistment of any man so transferred for a period of not to exceed 12 months. Without some such provision the force created would begin to melt away on the day it was mobilized. (See also sec. 11, ch. 5.)

Whether the operation of the bill will result in developing the militia of the States into a thoroughly efficient, well-organized national force sufficient for all military purposes can be determined only by experience. In view of the importance, as stated above, of using for war this available military asset, it is considered that a trial should be made and from experience gained a final satisfactory solution obtained.

2. ESTABLISHMENT OF DIVISION DISTRICTS AS A MEANS FOR SYSTEMATICALLY RAISING AND ORGANIZING THE VOLUNTEER FORCES.

While the peace organization of the national citizen soldiery can not be indicated in detail until its legal status is more definitely settled, it is possible to point out some of the objects of peace organization and the general relation of such organization to mobilization and preparation for war. As the war organization of any army involves the establishment of divisions and field armies, and as these complex units can not be extemporized on the outbreak of war, it may be accepted that the army of citizen soldiery should be made up of definitely organized divisions with the auxiliaries necessary to form complete field armies. Assuming that future legislation will provide for changing the status of the Organized Militia from a militia force of limited uses to a national force available for general military purposes, it will be possible to indicate a division organization based on the units now existing in the National Guard. An illustration may thus be made in a concrete way of the general objects to be attained.

The present strength of the National Guard is as follows:

Infantry, 139 regiments, 8 separate battalions, and 8 separate companies.
Cavalry, 74 troops.
Field artillery, 48 batteries.
Engineers, 22 companies.
Coast artillery, 120 companies.

It will be seen that we have the infantry organizations for approximately 16 divisions, the cavalry organizations for approximately 6 divisions, the field artillery for approximately 3 divisions, and the engineer contingent for 7 divisions.

As we have here the infantry organizations for 16 divisions, it will be assumed for purposes of illustration that our problem is to complete these divisions. For this purpose the territory of the United States should be divided into division districts, and it should be the policy of the Government to form a complete division in each division district by filling up the infantry regiments and by encouraging the organization of the artillery, cavalry, and other divisional components which are now lacking.

To each of these division districts should be assigned a General Staff officer, with the necessary number of inspector instructors detailed from the Regular Army, whose function it should be to arrange for the many details of organization which should be planned in peace and not left to extemporization in time of war. Among the duties of this division staff would be the preparation of plans of mobilization in conformity with general plans prepared in the War College. Problems of supply could also be worked out in advance and plans for the transportation of a division or a part of it to any point of concentration could be prepared by trained officers on the ground. The division staff would also be able to keep the War Department advised of the needs of the district and would act as the agent of the War Department in the gradual development of the lacking components of the division. The General Staff officer would also coordinate the efforts of the inspector instructors on duty with the several regiments and battalions so that, through him, the general war policy of the Nation could be transmitted to the units organized in the several States.

These division districts would not only facilitate the development of the organized army of citizen soldiery and simplify its mobilization in war, but the division districts would continue to be useful, even after the troops have gone to the front. The organization provided for the district in peace would prepare regimental depots for recruits and reservists in war, and if it should be necessary to augment the peace force by new levies of volunteers the division districts would furnish the machinery for the raising, organization, administration, and supply of such volunteer forces.

Taking the National Guard force as it exists to-day, we find that most of the individual units are far below their proper war strength, and that the Infantry of the National Guard is not provided with the proper proportion of Cavalry, Field Artillery, and special troops required to form divisions. Efforts are being made to correct these conditions, and it is believed that the organization of definite division districts would facilitate this reform.

An examination of the problem indicates that there are two reasons why the mounted troops have not been developed as rapidly as the Infantry. The first reason seems to be that, under our National Guard system, the troops are primarily State troops, and are presumably organized by the States in order to meet State requirements. It is obvious that the States will rarely have as much use for Cavalry or Field Artillery as they have for Infantry; and even if they need these forces, they will not need them in the proportion required for national purposes under conditions of modern warfare.

The second reason lies in the fact that Cavalry and Field Artillery are more expensive to raise than Infantry, and under present conditions Federal appropriations are not based on a recognition of this fact. For the minimum requirements of instruction, a battery of Field Artillery or a squadron of Cavalry must have a certain proportion of mounts, and under present conditions these animals must either be provided by the organizations or must be obtained at the charge of the State. The development of divisions in the National Guard, therefore, requires that the United States should furnish not only the necessary war material, but also an allotment for the purchase or hire of a certain number of animals for the Cavalry and Field Artillery. If the organized citizen soldiery is to be counted on in war, its Field Artillery and Cavalry must be organized in time of peace and must have the same facilities for training as the Infantry.

The only other solution of the problem is to maintain the Cavalry and Field Artillery organizations in the permanent establishment of the Regular Army. This solution, however, is not permissible economically, and in view of English experience with her territorial army, does not appear to be necessary. To maintain the divisional Cavalry and Field Artillery of the National Guard on the permanent establishment of the Regular Army would cost upward of $2,000,000 per year for each division of the National Guard, while the same forces could be economically maintained on a National Guard basis if less than one-tenth of that amount were allotted to cover cost of providing and maintaining a small quota of mounts to permit proper training.

It should, therefore, be the policy of the Government to develop the army of citizen soldiers in peace as an army of complete divisions, each division to contain its proper proportion of infantry, cavalry, field artillery, engineers, signal troops, and sanitary troops.

A correct organization of the military establishment will involve the organization of the regular mobile army into a force of complete tactical divisions, and a similar policy should apply to the force of citizen soldiers. It is true that on the adoption of the policy both the regular force and the one composed of citizen soldiers would be incomplete; but the completion of the organization would furnish a goal for future administration and legislation. The attainment of the ideal might be a question of years, and during the transition period practical makeshifts would be necessary as emergencies arise. If a war should come before the divisions were complete, it might be necessary to form a number of divisions by the consolidation of a greater number of incomplete divisions, but even this would involve less extemporization than would be necessary under present conditions. Or on the outbreak of war, if sufficient time should be available, the divisions might be completed by organizing new volunteer units to fill the gaps in the division organization. The existence of definite division districts would facilitate the organization of such forces. It would be understood that one of the peace problems of the incomplete divisions would be the preparation of plans for the completion of its organization in event of sudden emergency. Such new volunteers would be a logical expansion of the peace organization.

The fact that the present National Guard force lacks many of the units that would be necessary to convert it into a well-balanced war force is one of the principal arguments for legislation like that proposed in the volunteer bill now pending in the Senate. (See Appendix I.)

For the purposes of the foregoing discussion, divisional troops only have been considered. In working out a final plan the field army auxiliaries of cavalry, field artillery, and special troops, and the coast artillery reserves must also be provided for.

The complete organization of the mobile land forces of the United States will, therefore, include three distinct forces.

1. A regular army organized in divisions and cavalry brigades and ready for immediate use as an expeditionary force or for other purposes for which the citizen soldiery is not available, or for employment in the first stages of war while the citizen soldiery is mobilizing and concentrating.

2. An army of national citizen soldiers organized in peace in complete divisions and prepared to reenforce the Regular Army in time of war.

3. An army of volunteers to be organized under prearranged plans when greater forces are required than can be furnished by the Regular Army and the organized citizen soldiery.

The peace establishment of the Regular Army with the organized division districts of the National Guard should include the machinery for the recruiting organization and mobilization of this great third line of the national defense.

X.

Considerations determining the strength, composition, and organization of the land forces of the United States.

1. Political conditions affecting our country have changed very materially in the past 20 years, but it can hardly be said that the development of our land forces has kept pace with these changing conditions. Until quite recently our people have been almost wholly occupied with the task of overrunning our continental possessions and taking full possession of them. The Regular Army has been the forerunner of this movement, and has been organized, distributed, and trained for the requirements thus involved. This has kept the bulk of the Regular Army scattered in small units in our western country. Conquest and settlement have been fairly completed now, however, and the civil authorities are capable of maintaining orderly conditions as well in one part of our country as in another. If domestic questions were still the only ones that claimed serious attention it would seem that to deal with such questions only the Army should be distributed more equitably with respect to density of population.

But gradually our external problems have been assuming larger and larger proportions. While we were expanding other nations have been doing the like, and within the past few years it is found that practically the whole earth is now divided up among the principal nations and held by them either as actual possessions or as spheres of influence. Hitherto the interests of nations or of small groups of nations have been more or less local. But due to this world-wide expansion the contact between great nations and races has already become close. It tends to become continually closer, due to the increase of population and national needs, and due especially to the vastly increased facilities for intercommunication. With this close contact thus so recently established comes a competition, commercial, national, and racial, whose ultimate seriousness current events already enable us to gauge. Since our conflict with Spain in 1898 practically all of the principal nations of the earth have either been actively engaged in war or else brought to the verge of actual war. The evidence is clear that the nations and races capable of maintaining and protecting themselves are the only ones who can flourish in this world competition.

We have been drawn from our state of isolation and are inevitably involved in this competition. We must consider what preparation we will make to meet this change in our national situation. It may be said that we claim the undisturbed enjoyment of our possessions at home and the protection of our interests abroad. Our military requirements may then be summed up as follows: (1) To secure our home country from invasion; (2) to protect our foreign interests; (3) to maintain domestic peace and good order. Our forces should be proportioned, organized, and trained to meet these requirements.

2. ESTIMATE OF THE LAND FORCES NEEDED IN THE UNITED STATES.

Our requirements in the way of land forces are certain to change as the years go on, but in the light of present-day conditions it is estimated that at the outbreak of war with a first-class power we should be capable of mobilizing at once in the United States an effective force of 460,000 mobile troops and 42,000 Coast Artillery; that this is the minimum number of first-line troops necessary; and that to augment this force and replace its losses we should have plans made for raising immediately an additional force of 300,000 men.

To meet requirements less vital than a great national war—as for example, the sending of expeditionary forces to protect certain foreign interests—it may be presumed that we would draw upon the forces thus enumerated; and as in the light of our recent experiences we can not possible foretell to what places expeditions may have to be sent nor what numbers will be required, all of these forces should be available for service anywhere.

3. REGULAR AND VOLUNTEER TROOPS.

The Regular Army contingent of this total mobile force at home should be sufficient to provide an expeditionary force capable of acting with the utmost promptness and decision and sufficient to furnish a training nucleus for the volunteer troops in peace and a stiffening element in war. To meet conditions we can now foresee it is believed the Regular Army should comprise four complete divisions, and that it should furnish as extra divisional troops a division of Cavalry and the quota of Heavy Field Artillery, Engineers, Signal, and sanitary troops appropriate for one field army. On this basis the regular contingent of mobile troops within the United States proper, when raised to war strength, would comprise about 112,000 men. The remaining 348,000 mobile troops would be made up of citizen soldiers organized in divisions and in field army auxiliaries. Each group of three division districts should furnish three complete divisions of citizen soldiers and the extra divisional troops considered appropriate for a field army of three divisions. On this basis the quota of 348,000 citizen soldiers might be raised from 12 division districts (as indicated in Chapter IX, the detailed organization of the citizen soldiery will depend upon the extent to which the present Organized Militia can be utilized for general military purposes. The organization of 12 divisions, with the extra divisional troops for four field armies and with the necessary Coast Artillery companies, will absorb all of the units now organized in the National Guard), and they would be the equivalent of four normal type field armies. The regular and volunteer contingents taken together would then represent five field armies, but the exact number in which the various divisions and auxiliaries would actually be combined to make up field armies would depend entirely upon the necessities of the campaign in view.

The regular contingent of Coast Artillery troops in the United States should comprise 26,500 men when on war footing, leaving 21,000 to be furnished by the citizen soldiery. These figures are based on a complete regular personnel for mine companies and 50 per cent personnel of regulars for gun companies for authorized armament.

XI.

A council of national defense.

As war is but a phase of international politics, so military policy is but a phase of international policy. In its broadest sense the organization of the land forces is but a part of the national war organization, which includes the organization of the sea forces and of all other national resources.

A scientific solution of our military problem must include a determination and definition of national policy and the provision of sufficient military and naval forces to support that policy against such adverse interests as may develop from time to time. As several departments of the Government are concerned in the settlement of this question, it is obvious that a sound policy must be predicated upon a comprehensive view of the whole problem with the view of coordinating and balancing its several elements.

In order to formulate a comprehensive policy for the consideration of Congress, it is believed that there should be a council of national defense similar to the one proposed in H. R. 1309. The function of this council, as defined in the bill, is to "report to the President, for transmission to Congress, a general policy of national defense and such recommendation of measures relating thereto as it shall deem necessary and expedient."

The members of the council, as provided in the bill, are as follows:

The President of the United States (ex officio president of the council).
The Secretary of State (to preside in the absence of the President).
The Secretary of War.
The Secretary of the Navy.
The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate.
The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.
The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate.
The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate.
The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives.
The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives.
The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives.
The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives.
The Chief of the General Staff of the Army.
An officer of the Navy not below the rank of captain, to be selected by the Secretary of the Navy.
The president of the Army War College.
The president of the Navy War College.

It would seem that through the agency of this council the problem of national defense should receive the joint consideration of all of the branches of the Government which are responsible for its ultimate solution.

APPENDIX I.

A bill (S. 2518) to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war.

Be it enacted, etc., That the land forces of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, the Militia, and such volunteer forces as Congress may authorize.

SEC. 2. That the volunteer forces shall be raised and organized as in this act provided, only during the existence of war, or while war is imminent, and only after Congress has or shall have authorized the President to raise such a force: Provided, That the term of enlistment in the volunteer forces shall be the same as that for the Regular Army, and all officers and enlisted men composing such volunteer forces shall be mustered out of the service of the United States as soon as practicable after the President shall have issued a proclamation announcing the termination of the war or the passing of the emergency.

SEC. 3. That when volunteer forces are to be raised the President shall issue his proclamation, stating the number of men desired for each arm, corps, and department, within such limits as may be fixed by law, and the Secretary of War shall prescribe such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the terms of this act, as may be necessary for the purpose of examining, organizing, and receiving into the service the men called for: Provided, That the power to organize shall include the power to provide the officers and enlisted men of all grades and classes, including trained nurses, male and female, that may be necessary in the various arms, corps, and departments: Provided further, That all enlisted men received into the service in the volunteer forces shall, as far as practicable, be taken from the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, in proportion to their respective populations: Provided further, That when the raising of a volunteer force shall have been authorized by Congress, and after the Organized Militia of any arm or class shall have been called into the service of the United States, volunteers of that particular arm or class may be raised and accepted into said service in accordance with the terms of this act regardless of the extent to which other arms or classes of said militia shall have been called into said service.

SEC. 4. That the volunteer forces shall be subject to the laws, orders, and regulations governing the Regular Army in so far as such laws, orders, and regulations are applicable to officers or enlisted men whose permanent retention in the military service, either on the active list or on the retired list, is not contemplated by existing law; and no distinction shall be made between the Regular Army and the volunteer forces in respect to the conferring upon officers or enlisted men of brevet rank, medals of honor, certificates of merit, or other rewards for distinguished service: Provided, That officers of the volunteer forces shall be competent to sit upon courts-martial for the trial of officers and soldiers of the Regular Army and of the National Guard, or Organized Militia, when the latter has been called into the service of the United States; that officers of the Regular Army shall be competent to sit upon courts-martial for the trial of officers and soldiers of the volunteer forces and of the National Guard, or Organized Militia, when the latter has been called into the service of the United States, unless objection be made by the accused, and that no distinction shall be made between the Regular Army and the volunteer forces in respect to the eligibility of any regular or volunteer officer for service in any court of inquiry or military commission: Provided further, That the organization of all units of the line and of the signal troops of the volunteer forces shall be the same as that prescribed by law and regulations for the corresponding units of the Regular Army: Provided further, That when military conditions so require the President may organize the land forces of the United States into brigades and divisions and such higher units as he may deem necessary, and the composition of units higher than the regiment shall be as he may prescribe: Provided further, That to each regiment of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, and to each battalion of engineers and signal troops organized under this act, there shall be attached the same personnel of the Medical Department as are attached to like organizations of the Regular Army: Provided further, That the organization of the coast defenses, of machine-gun detachments, establishments of the Medical Department, remount depots, military trains, secret-service agencies, military prisons, lines of communication, including their supply deopts, and of other adjuncts that may be necessary in the prosecution of war, and the organization of which is not otherwise provided for by law, shall be as the President may from time to time direct.

SEC. 5. That the President is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint all officers required by this act, the number and grade of such officers not to exceed the number and grade of like officers provided for a like force of the Regular Army: Provided, That all appointments below the grade of brigadier general in the line of the Volunteer forces shall be by commission in an arm of the service and not by commission in any particular regiment; and officers in each arm of the service shall be assigned to regiments and transferred from one regiment to another, as the interests of the service may require, by orders from the Secretary of War: Provided further, That no officer above the grade of colonel shall be appointed under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. That to provide the staff officers that will be necessary in the various staff corps and departments in time of war or while war is imminent, and that are not otherwise provided for in this act, the President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, such number of Volunteer staff officers of the proper grades for such corps and departments as he may find necessary: Provided, That the total number of such officers so appointed, including all such officers of the National Guard called into the service of the United States, shall not exceed the ratio of 1 officer to 200 enlisted men for all National Guard and Volunteer forces called into the service of the United States: Provided further, That the number of officers appointed in each grade in such staff corps and departments shall not exceed in each staff corps or department the proportionate strength of the corresponding grade as established by law for like staff corps and departments of the Regular Army: Provided further, That the President may appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, Volunteer chaplains at the rate of 1 for each regiment of Volunteer Infantry, Cavalry, and Field Artillery, and 1 for every 12 companies of Volunteer Coast Artillery raised, with rank corresponding to that established by law for chaplains in the Regular Army.

SEC. 7. That in appointing the Volunteer officers authorized by this act the President may select them from the Regular Army, from those duly qualified and registered pursuant to section 23 of the act of Congress approved January 21, 1903, from the National Guard of the District of Columbia, and, upon the recommendation of the various governors, from the National Guard of the several States and Territories in proportion, as far as practicable, to their respective populations, and as near as may be from the localities from which the troops were recruited, and from the country at large: Provided, That in appointments from the country at large preference shall be given those who have had honorable service in the Regular Army, the National Guard, or the Volunteer forces, or who have been graduated from educational institutions in which military instruction is compulsory: Provided further, That at the same time, not to exceed 1 Regular Army officer shall hold a Volunteer commission in any 1 battalion of volunteer engineers or signal troops, or in any 1 battalion of Volunteer Field Artillery; and not to exceed 4 Regular Army officers shall hold commissions in any 1 regiment of Volunteer Cavalry, Field Artillery, or Infantry, or in any 12 companies of Coast Artillery, including their field and staff, at the same time: And provided further, That Regular Army officers appointed as officers of Volunteers under this act shall not thereby vacate their Regular Army commissions or be prejudiced in their relative or lineal standing therein.

SEC. 8. That the temporary vacancies created in any grade not above that of colonel among the commissioned personnel of any arm, staff corps, or department of the Regular Army, through appointments of officers thereof to higher volunteer rank, shall be filled by temporary promotion according to seniority in rank from officers holding commissions in the next lower grade in said arm, staff corps, or department; and all temporary vacancies created in any grade by temporary promotions shall in like manner be filled from, and thus create temporary vacancies in, the next lower grade; and the vacancies that remain thereafter in said arm, staff corps, or department that can not be filled by temporary promotions, as prescribed in this section, may be filled by the temporary appointment of officers of such number and grade or grades as shall maintain said arm, corps, or department at the full commissioned strength authorized by law: Provided, That in the staff corps and departments subject to the provisions of sections 26 and 27 of the act of Congress, approved February 2, 1901, and acts amendatory thereto, temporary vacancies that can not be filled by temporary promotions, as hereinbefore prescribed, shall be filled by temporary details made in the manner prescribed in said sections 26 and 27 and acts amendatory thereto, and the resulting temporary vacancies in the branches of the Army from which the details are so made shall be filled as hereinbefore in this section prescribed: Provided further, That officers temporarily promoted or appointed under the terms of this section shall be so promoted or appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for terms that shall not extend beyond the termination of the war or the passing of the existing emergency as defined by the President's proclamation, whereupon the said officers shall be discharged from the positions held by them under their temporary promotions or appointments and officers detailed as herein authorized shall be relieved from their temporary details: Provided, further, That officers temporarily promoted under the provisions of this section shall not vacate their permanent commissions nor be prejudiced in their lineal or relative standing in the Regular Army.

SEC. 9. That all returns and muster rolls of organizations of the volunteer forces and of militia organizations while in the service of the United States shall be rendered to The Adjutant General of the Army, and upon the muster out of such organizations the records pertaining to them shall be transferred to and filed in The Adjutant General's Office. And regimental and all other medical officers serving with volunteer troops, or with militia organizations in the service of the United States, in the field or elsewhere, shall keep a daily record of all soldiers reported sick or wounded, as shown by the morning calls or reports, and shall deposit such reports, with other reports provided for in this section, in The Adjutant General's Office, as provided for herein for other reports, returns, and muster rolls.

SEC. 10. That in time of war all organizations of the land forces shall be recruited and maintained as near their prescribed strength as practicable. For this purpose the necessary rendezvous and depots shall be established by the Secretary of War for the enlistment and training of all recruits, and in order that officers may be available for recruiting duty the President is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint officers of Volunteers of the proper arm of the service, additional to those elsewhere herein authorized, in numbers not to exceed at the rate of one major, four captains, five first lieutenants, and five second lieutenants for each organized regiment of Cavalry, Field Artillery, or Infantry, each 3 battalions of Engineers, or each 12 companies of Coast Artillery; that for purposes of instruction and discipline the troops at recruit depots herein authorized may be organized into companies and battalions, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, with noncommissioned officers and privates of such grades and numbers as may be prescribed by the President. The recruit rendezvous and recruit depots herein prescribed shall be under the direct control of the Secretary of War, and shall render their reports and returns to The Adjutant General of the Army: Provided, That to maintain the National Guard organizations in the service of the United States at their maximum strength the recruiting rendezvous and depots in any State or Territory may, at the request of the governor thereof, enlist and train recruits for the National Guard organizations in the service of the United States from that State.

SEC. 11. That, in the organization of the recruiting system, the President is authorized to employ retired officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates of the Regular Army, either with their rank on the retired list or, in the case of enlisted men, with increased noncommissioned rank; or he may, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint and employ retired officers below the grade of colonel, with increased Volunteer commissioned rank not to exceed one grade above that held by them upon the retired list, or retired enlisted men with Volunteer commissioned rank not above the grade of first lieutenant: Provided, That retired officers and enlisted men while thus employed shall not be eligible for transfer to the field units, but shall receive the full pay and allowances of the respective grades in which they are serving, whether Volunteer or Regular, in lieu of their retired pay and allowances: Provided further, That upon the termination of the duty or, in case of those given Volunteer rank, upon muster out as Volunteers, the officers and men shall revert to their retired status.

SEC. 12. That, except as otherwise specifically prescribed by law, all officers provided for in this act are subject to such assignments of duty and such transfers as the President may direct: Provided, That medical officers of Volunteers when detailed as consulting surgeons shall not exercise command over the hospitals to which they may be assigned for duty, except that by virtue of their commissions they may command all enlisted men: Provided further, That medical inspectors shall be detailed for duty with each army, army corps, and division, and for the base and lines of communications, and that no officer shall be detailed for duty as a medical inspector except he be experienced in military sanitation.

SEC. 13. That all officers and enlisted men of the Volunteer forces shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades in the Regular Army: Provided, That enlisted men in the Quartermaster's Department and Subsistence Department of the Volunteer forces shall receive the same pay and allowances as enlisted men of corresponding grades in the Engineer Corps.

SEC. 14. That the commander of a division or higher military unit is authorized to appoint, from time to time, military boards of not less than three nor more than five officers of the Volunteer forces to examine into the capacity, qualifications, conduct, and efficiency of any commissioned officer of said forces within his command: Provided, That each member of the board shall be superior in rank to the officer whose qualifications are to be inquired into: Provided further, That if the report of such board is adverse to the continuance of any officer, and if the report be approved by the President, such officer shall be discharged from service in the Volunteer forces, at the discretion of the President, with one month's pay and allowances.

SEC. 15. That the act approved April 22, 1898, entitled "An act to provide for temporarily increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes," is hereby repealed, and all other laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are, to the extent of such inconsistency only, hereby repealed.

MILITIA AND VOLUNTEERS AND METHODS OF APPOINTING THEIR OFFICERS.

Memorandum submitted by Senator DU PONT to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs concerning the bill (S. 2518) for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war.

The land forces of the United States are divided into three separate and distinct classes, consisting—

(a) Of the Regular Army, which is the military establishment maintained during both peace and war, under the provisions of Article I, section 8, of the Constitution, giving Congress power to raise and support armies and to make rules for the government and regulation of the same.

(b) Of the militia of the different States and Territories and of the District of Columbia, when called into the service of the United States, under the provisions of Article I, section 8, of the Constitution, giving Congress power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

(c) Of such volunteer forces as Congress shall authorize to be raised, under the provisions of Article I, section 8, of the Constitution, giving Congress power to raise and support armies and to make rules for the government and regulation of the same.

MILITIA.

Under the acts of Congress approved May 8, 1792, July 17, 1862, and March 2, 1867, the militia of the different States, Territories, and District of Columbia is composed of all able-bodied citizens between the ages of 18 and 45; but under the provisions of the act of Congress approved January 21, 1903, known as the Dick law, and amendments thereto, the militia, as above constituted, is classified under two heads:

First. The Organized Militia, often styled the National Guard, consisting of officers commissioned by the governors of the respective States and Territories and in the District of Columbia by the President and of enlisted men who have engaged to serve for such specified periods as may be determined by the laws of the different States and Territories. In the District of Columbia these periods are determined by the United States statutes.

Second. The reserve militia, consisting of the whole body of the militia not regularly enlisted, organized, and uniformed.

The governors have power to call out the militia for service within their respective States and Territories, and Congress has power, under section 8, Article I, of the Constitution, to call out the militia of the respective States and Territories to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

Congress, by the statute of 1795, made it lawful for the President to call out such numbers of the militia as he may deem necessary, and when properly mustered into the United States service such numbers as may be called out become a part of the land forces of the United States. It is evident, however, that it is not practicable for the President to call out such portions of the militia as do not possess a military organization. While the President has authority to determine the period for which the militia is to be called into the service of the United States, under the statutes he can not detain any officer or enlisted man beyond the term of his existing State commission or enlistment; and, except in the case of the militia of the District of Columbia, he can not make any appointments or promotions of commissioned officers of the Organized Militia of the States and Territories when called into the service of the United States, the authority to make such appointments being expressly reserved to the respective States under section 8 of Article I of the Constitution and given by statute to the governors of Territories.

VOLUNTEERS.

In general terms the word "volunteer" applies to a man who voluntarily engages in the military service of the United States, or of some particular State or Territory, and differentiates him from a man who is drafted compulsorily into the military service—a power which Congress has the right to exercise and did exercise during the Civil War. In this sense the term "volunteer" is just as much applicable to the officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army as to the officers and enlisted men of the so-called volunteer troops. It is equally applicable to the Organized Militia, so far as concerns their relations to their respective States and Territories, but when called into the national service by the President they are in no sense Volunteers so far as the United States is concerned.

To avoid confusion, it should be noted that the term "volunteers," as applied technically to one of the three classes into which our land forces are divided, is used in a special or restricted sense and includes only the troops which have been raised and maintained for limited periods under authority of Congress as adjuncts to the Regular Army in times of actual or threatened war or other emergency.

So far as the constitutional authority for their creation is concerned, the regular and the so-called volunteer forces are upon an identical footing, but are differentiated by the fact that the former are permanent and the latter temporary.

The term "volunteers," as applied to military organizations, appears for the first time in the act of May 28, 1798, which empowered the President to accept any company or companies of Volunteers who might associate and offer themselves for the service. This act authorized the President to appoint the commissioned officers of such company or companies, and the act of June 22, 1798, empowered him to organize the companies into legions, regiments, or battalions, and to appoint field officers for the same.

It will be noted that as the States or Territories are not mentioned in the act of May, 1798, the companies of Volunteers to be raised under its provisions were not in any sense State organizations, but could be taken from the country at large.

Volunteers are next mentioned in the act of March 2, 1799, which empowered the President to accept 28 regiments of such troops to be employed in the same manner as the militia, and to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the volunteer field officers.

In 1803, when difficulties arose with Spain, the President was authorized by the act of March 3 of that year to require the executives of such of the States as he might deem expedient to organize, arm, equip, and hold in readiness to march at a moment's warning, detachments of militia, not exceeding in all 80,000 men; and the second section of this statute gave the President power to authorize the State executives to accept as part of such detachments any corps of Volunteers, the officers of whom were to be appointed by the State authorities.

The acts of February 24, 1807, and March 30, 1808, when trouble was anticipated with England, were practically repetitions of the statute of 1803, except that the number of men to be called out were not to exceed 30,000 and 100,000, respectively, including corps of Volunteers.

The act of February 6, 1812, was largely a reenactment of the statute of 1807, except that the number of Volunteers was not to exceed 50,000 men; but the act of July 6 of the same year repealed this statute so far as the appointment of officers was concerned and empowered the President to appoint and commission them, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The act of February 24, 1814, reenacted the legislation of 1812, except that the President was authorized to receive such proportion of Volunteers "as in his judgment the public service may require," who were to serve for five years, or during the war; and about a month later the act of March 30, 1814, empowered the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make all necessary appointments of officers and to fill all vacancies. During the following year there was still further legislation in regard to Volunteers. Sections 3 and 4 of the act approved January 27, 1815, empowered the President to receive into the service of the United States any Volunteers who might offer their services, not to exceed 40,000 men, and required that the officers should be commissioned by the President.

Passing now to the Florida War, the act of May 23, 1836, authorized the President to accept the services of not exceeding 10,000 Volunteers, the officers to be appointed in the manner prescribed by law in the several States and Territories to which such Volunteers belonged, and practically the same legislation was reenacted on March 3, 1839, when 50,000 Volunteers were authorized at the time of the dispute with Great Britain in regard to the Maine boundary line, and again on May 13, 1846, at the beginning of the Mexican War, 50,000 Volunteers were likewise authorized. It is to be observed, however, that the act of March 3, 1847, empowered the President to organize the Volunteers who might reenlist into companies, battalions, and regiments, and to commission the officers of the same.

Under the act of April 7, 1858, a regiment of Volunteers was organized for the defense and protection of the Texas frontier, and two regiments to quell the disturbances in Utah, the officers of the three regiments to be appointed in the manner prescribed by law in the several States and Territories, except the regimental quartermasters and commissaries, who were detailed from the Regular Army.

During the Civil War the first legislation in regard to volunteers, enacted on the 22d of July, 1861, made a radical departure from either of the previous methods of appointing volunteer officers, inasmuch as it provided that the company officers were to be elected by the men and the field officers by the company officers. But the act of the 6th of August following rescinded this and prescribed that the vacancies among the commissioned officers of volunteer regiments were to be filled by the State governors.

Under the act of July 17, 1862, colored troops were first organized in South Carolina and Louisiana, and later in many other places to the number of nearly 100,000 men. While the officers in most instances were not named directly by the President, they were appointed, after passing careful examinations, by The Adjutant General and other officials under his authority.

On April 28, 1863, an invalid corps was organized for garrison duty, made up of officers and enlisted men who had been wounded or otherwise disabled for active field service, the officers, after passing satisfactory examinations, being appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. About the same time six regiments and one company of United States Volunteers were organized, the officers being all appointed by the Secretary of War after passing examinations; and on the 20th of May, 1864, a regiment of veteran volunteer engineers was raised in the Army of the Cumberland, the officers being appointed by the President upon the recommendation of the commander of the Army of the Cumberland.

The last act relating to volunteers during the Civil War was that of November 28, 1864, which created a new Volunteer Army corps, consisting of not less than 20,000 men and known as the United States Veteran Volunteers, the officers being appointed by the Secretary of War after rigid examination.

The first legislation in regard to volunteers passed during the Spanish War was that of April 22, 1898, which gave the appointment of all regimental and company officers to the governors of the States in which their respective organizations were raised, except that the President was authorized to organize not exceeding 3,000 men possessing special qualifications, and to appoint the officers of the same. The act of May 11 of that year provided for a volunteer brigade of engineers and a force of 10,000 immunes, all of the officers to be appointed by the President, with the consent of the Senate.

The latest legislation on the statute books in regard to volunteers is that of March 2, 1899, which authorized the raising from the country at large of a force not exceeding 35,000 men for service in the Philippine insurrection, and provided that the officers should be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It is admitted by all that the troops mustered into the service under the provisions of this act became the best disciplined and best instructed, and were therefore the most efficient and most economical body of volunteers that have ever formed a part of our national land forces.

It will be seen from the foregoing that there has been no uniform rule in the method of appointing officers of the volunteer forces, and that the legislation has often conferred this power wholly or in part upon the President, while at other times it has been vested in the governors of the States and Territories.

In all but two States of the Union militia officers below the rank of major are elected by the men and the field officers by the company officers. When the appointment of volunteer officers has been left to the State and Territorial executives, the usual practice has been—and particularly during the Spanish War—to make nearly all such appointments, and promotions as well, on analogous lines, the practical result being that the volunteer officers are elected by those whom they are to command. It is needless to point out that the appointment and promotion of officers on these lines is not only wholly wrong in principle but most pernicious in results, radically affecting, as it does, the discipline and efficiency of the troops and enormously increasing the expense to the Government by making it necessary to employ at least twice as large a number in order to secure the same result. In defense of this bad system it is claimed that the men would come forward more readily and in greater numbers, but when we consider the vast population from which the Volunteers can be drawn it is believed that this argument has but little weight. Within three months after the declaration of war with Spain no less than 56,258 men had enlisted in the Regular Army. If in 1898 such a large number of men were willing to enlist in the Regular Army, with its reputation for strict discipline and where the men have no voice whatever in the selection of their officers, should another war occur it would seem reasonable to suppose (taking into consideration the large increase of our population) that the necessary men would be forthcoming for the volunteer regiments, even if the appointment of the officers were vested in the President. As a matter of fact, in 1899, although the climate was very hot and unhealthy and the seat of war was at the other end of the world, there was no difficulty whatever experienced in raising from the country at large 35,000 Volunteers for service in the Philippines, the officers being all appointed by the President.

Even if the contention above referred to were true, it is submitted that, in the judgment of all military experts, volunteer troops in which the officers are elected by those under them would not be as efficient as a much lesser number organized under the system proposed in the bill, under which the President appoints the officers subject to the restrictions and limitations therein contained, and this, too, with an immense diminution in the expense of the war.

APPENDIX II.

Organization of Field Artillery—Organization of the ammunition service of divisions and armies.

The proposed organization of the Field Artillery is:

For each division:

1 regiment of 3 battalions:
1 battalion of 3 batteries of four 3-inch guns	12
1 battalion of 3 batteries of four 3-inch guns	12
1 battalion of 2 batteries of four 3.8-inch howitzers	8
1 regiment of 3 battalions:
1 battalion of 3 batteries of four 3-inch guns	12
1 battalion of 3 batteries of four 3-inch guns	12
1 battalion of 2 batteries of four 4.7-inch howitzers	8
1 ammunition column of 2 battalions.

For each field army in addition to the divisional Artillery:

1 regiment of 2 battalions:
1 battalion of 2 batteries of four 4.7-inch guns	8
1 battalion of 2 batteries of four 6-inch howitzers	8
1 ammunition column of 1 battalion.

For each Cavalry division:

1 regiment of 3 battalions of 2 batteries of four guns each, caliber 3-inch	24
1 ammunition column of 1 battalion.

The normal organization to be prescribed for the Field Artillery pertaining to divisions and field armies is complicated by the facts that several different calibers must be provided; that they must be provided in proper proportion, and that the various calibers must be grouped in organizations best adapted to employment in war and training in peace.

The choice of the proper organization for the divisional Artillery affords the principal difficulty. For the total number of Infantry and Cavalry in the division it is estimated that the total number of field-pieces to be provided is about 60. It is regarded as necessary to have a certain number of howitzers included in this number, and it is regarded as desirable for purposes of training in peace and employment in war to group the various elements in definite regimental organizations.

After study of various combinations, the solution proposed above is regarded as best meeting the needs of our service. Each regiment is given a fair proportion of howitzers, and no more. With its three battalions—2 gun and 1 howitzer—the regiment is capable of meeting a variety of requirements in war and is well adapted to illustrating the varied uses of artillery during combined instruction with the other arms in the various parts of the country in time of peace. Each division is provided with a reduced number of both types of the fairly mobile howitzers (3.8-inch and 4.7-inch). This distribution is preferred to that of assigning one particular type to each division, since it may be impossible to foretell which division of a field army will need certain types most. It is, indeed, quite possible that all divisions, when deployed, will have use for a limited number of howitzers of both types.

The organization proposed for the horse Artillery is adapted to providing a two-battery battalion for each Cavalry brigade, which is believed to be the proper quota. If desirable, the third battery in each battalion may form the nucleus for ammunition service.

As for the Army Artillery, two batteries of 4.7-inch guns and two batteries of 6-inch howitzers are regarded as the proper quota for the normal type field army of three divisions. The third battery in each battalion may similarly be utilized as the nucleus of the ammunition service.

The strength and composition of batteries, battalions, and regiments of Field Artillery are determined by the characteristics of the particular types to be served, and hence it is not possible to provide a homogeneous organization. The organization as prescribed in legal enactments should hence be flexible, so as to permit varying the types assigned for any particular service to meet the requirements of the case and so as to permit a gradual evolution in normal organization as our experience with the various types and calibers of guns becomes more extensive. The law covering the organization of Field Artillery should accordingly be worded so as to indicate the maximum number of brigades, regiments, and ammunition battalions allowable, the maximum number of battalions and batteries in each, and the maximum strength of each unit, and leave it to the President to fix within this limit the strength of regiments, battalions, and batteries.

The existing law permits the desired flexibility, with the exception that it fixes the minimum strength. If the law prescribed the maximum strength of a regiment of Field Artillery as three battalions of three batteries each and indicated only the total maximum number of officers and enlisted men, then the President could vary the organization of any particular regiment to meet the needs of service.

AMMUNITION SERVICE.

The proposed organization of the divisional ammunition service is as follows:

	Officers.	Veterinarians.	Men.	Vehicles.	Animals.
First Battalion:
Staff	2	1	9		12
Gun ammunition company	3		149	27	182
Howitzer ammunition company	3		163	28	211
Infantry ammunition company	4		145	59	266
Total	12	1	466	114	671
Second Battalion:
Staff	2	1	9		12
Artillery train company	5		181	66	345
Infantry train company	4		145	50	296
Total	11	1	335	115	653
Divisional ammunition service: Staff	2	1	8		11
Grand total	25	3	809	229	1,335

Staff of an ammunition or train battalion:

1 major.
1 lieutenant.
1 veterinarian.
1 sergeant major.
3 sergeants, } agents and scouts.
3 corporals, }
2 privates (horseholders and orderlies).

Staff of headquarters divisional ammunition service:

1 colonel or lieutenant colonel.
1 lieutenant.
1 veterinarian.
3 sergeants, } agents and scouts.
3 corporals, }
2 privates (horseholders and orderlies).

The complement proposed for the Army ammunition service is a battalion of two batteries; the staff of the battalion to be similar to that of a divisional ammunition battalion; the strength of each company to be the same as that of the howitzer ammunition company given above.

If it is deemed desirable to provide a separate ammunition service for the Cavalry division, the complement for this duty should comprise a battalion of three companies each having the strength of the gun-ammunition company given above.

For economic reasons it is not considered desirable to maintain complete ammunition organizations in time of peace. A peace nucleus must be provided and all plans carefully worked out for securing the personnel necessary for passing to the war basis. To organize at once an effective service there must be a proper reserve system.

For the divisional ammunition service, a lieutenant colonel of one of the Artillery regiments should be designated as chief of the service and should be charged, in peace, with the detailed preparations for passing to the enlarged war footing. The third batteries of the two howitzer battalions of the division should constitute the nucleus of the ammunition service. All the officers and a limited number of enlisted men of these batteries should be maintained in peace; they may be employed on militia or other duty, but should be assembled at maneuver camps periodically for practicing, on a reduced basis, their appropriate duties in the ammunition service. On mobilization, the captains of these two skeleton batteries should be given temporary commissions as majors; the six lieutenants should be given temporary commissions as captains. A major would thus be provided to command each battalion, and captains would be provided to command the three companies of the first battalion and the two companies of the second battalion. The extra captain would be staff officer for the lieutenant colonel. The remainder of the officers would be reserve officers, designated in time of peace for their particular positions. There should be enough enlisted men in the two skeletonized howitzer batteries to provide a staff sergeant for the lieutenant colonel and each of the two majors and at least six noncommissioned officers for each ammunition or train company, thus making a total of 33 men for the two companies.

An effort should be made to enroll reservists and volunteers in the particular district in which the division is serving to make up the remainder of the enlisted strength.

For the Army ammunition service the lieutenant colonel of the Heavy Artillery regiment should command the battalion, and the skeletonized batteries should have, on the peace basis, a nucleus of officers and men.

Similar arrangements may be made for the ammunition service of a Cavalry division.

DETAILS OF DIVISIONAL SERVICE.

FIELD ARTILLERY.

The experience of recent wars seems to indicate that for the light field piece (3-inch) there must be maintained on wheels, in front of the advance supply depot, approximately 500 rounds per gun.

The supply to be thus maintained for the howitzer and other heavier calibers is not so well established. In an important engagement their expenditure will be great also, but as each wheeled vehicle can carry but a very limited number of these heavier projectiles, and the number of such vehicles must be kept down to the very minimum in order to reduce length of trains, it is evidently impracticable to keep anything like 500 pounds per gun on wheels for these calibers. Similarly, the number to be so maintained on pack mules for the mountain howitzers must be less than 500.

The number to be maintained on wheels or packs for the different calibers is estimated as follows:

	Rounds.
For the 3-inch rifle	464
For the 3-inch mountain howitzer	200
For the 3.8-inch howitzer	312
For the 4.7-inch howitzer	180

As for the distribution of the foregoing ammunition, the best practice seems to be to keep with the guns and their combat trains a number sufficiently large to give them a reasonable insurance against exhaustion of ammunition before resupply commences and to keep in the ammunition column the remaining amount as a rolling reserve to be served out to the various battalions and batteries in accordance with their expenditures.

On the basis of 3 caissons or 17 pack mules per gun the following are the amounts to be kept with the guns and their combat trains:

	Rounds per gun.
For the 3-inch gun	358
For the 3-inch mountain howitzer	170
For the 3.8-inch howitzer	168
For the 4.7-inch howitzer	90

The following, then, remain to be carried in the ammunition columns:

	Rounds per gun.
For the 3-inch gun	106
For the 3-inch mountain howitzer	120
For the 3.8-inch howitzer	144
For the 4.7-inch howitzer	90

Such being the amounts of ammunition to be carried by the divisional ammunition column, we may decide what the composition and organization of this column should be.

The function of the column is to receive ammunition from the line of communication troops and transfer it to the combat trains of the batteries. The distance to be covered in making this transfer may vary very considerably. The average distance to be traversed may be assumed as one-half day's march; this on the assumption that the advance supply depot will be located one day's march in rear of the combatant troops and that the line of communication troops will feed subdepots for each division a half day's march farther on. A day's march may be taken as 18 miles; hence we have 9 miles as the distance the division train will have to cover on the above hypothesis. If the distance is greater or less than this, the amount of ammunition that can be delivered at the front each day will be proportionately diminished or increased.

The routes to be followed in transporting ammunition by the divisional train may be illustrated graphically as shown in the following diagram:

[Diagram omitted in RECORD. See report on the organization of the land forces of the United States.]

The first portion of the travel from the divisional subbase toward the front will be on some already existing road, or on one which will have to be immediately blazed out for all the divisional supply trains. On approaching the combatant troops, however, some point on this route will have to be selected from which elements of the column can be sent to the different combat trains. This point may be termed "the distributing point." From here the vehicles will have to move often across country to reach the vicinity of the combat trains. Each element will move up to a convenient point to which empty caissons from the combat trains may be sent to be refilled. It may be assumed that these points are ordinarily about 1 mile in rear of the fighting line, and that the distance to be covered from distributing point will be 3 or 4 miles.

The procedure above outlined seems to be the one that would naturally be followed in the average case. It suggests two things as to the organization and composition of the divisional train:

1. That the train should be divided into two échelons: The first to have the duty of transporting ammunition from the distributing point to the various combat trains; the second to have the duty of bringing ammunition up to the road to the distributing point.

2. That ammunition should be carried in caissons in the first échelon, since all sorts of country may have to be negotiated; while for the second échelon Army wagons or motor trucks should be used, inasmuch as a great saving in men, animals, and length of train is thus insured, and inasmuch as wagons or trucks would be entirely suitable for the work to be done.

The foregoing may be accepted as fundamental considerations determining the organization of division trains. Both échelons should be capable of ready subdivision so that full subdivisions may be moving to the front while empty ones are moving to the rear to be filled. When the line occupied by the division is very extended, it may be desirable at times to split the leading échelon in two and send each part to establish a distributing point for supplying its part of the line.

The second échelon should have a section comprising the reserve of men, horses, matériel, and equipment and also the personnel and equipment for making minor repairs.

Reverting now to the amount of ammunition to be carried by the divisional ammunition column and accepting the fact that, so far as practicable, the total amount should be about equally divided between the two échelons, we have the following:

	First échelon.	Second échelon.
3-inch gun	53	53
3-inch mountain howitzer	40	80
3.8-inch howitzer	72	72
4.7-inch howitzer	45	45

From these figures we may now deduce the number of caissons, wagons, and packs to carry the amount of ammunition required in each échelon of the divisional ammunition column:

	First échelon—caissons or packs.	Second échelon—wagons.
3-inch gun	24	25
3-inch mountain howitzer	144	25
3.8-inch howitzer	12	10
4.7-inch howitzer	12	12

It thus appears that the first échelon of a divisional ammunition column must have—

Twenty-four caissons for 3-inch ammunition.
Twelve caissons for 3.8-inch ammunition.
Twelve caissons for 4.7-inch ammunition.

It is proposed to organize these into a gun ammunition company of 24 caissons and a howitzer ammunition company of 24 caissons, each as shown in tables appended hereto.

The second échelon requires 25 wagons for 3-inch, 10 for 3.8-inch, and 13 for 4.7-inch ammunition, or a total of 48 wagons.

It is proposed to organize these into an Artillery train company, as shown in table herewith. If it is found that motor trucks can be substituted for wagons, then the number of vehicles will be reduced and the personnel will be correspondingly reduced. Attached to the second echelon is the reserve section, comprising spare men, animals, matériel, and repair outfits.

If mountain guns are assigned to a division, the composition of the ammunition trains will depend upon whether these guns constitute the only guns of the division or are only a portion of the divisional artillery. The mountain ammunition company shown in the table attached will transport 40 rounds per gun for 36 guns, or 60 per gun for 24 guns. One company will suffice if only one regiment of the Artillery brigade is armed with mountain guns, but two must be taken if both regiments are so armed. If battalions of other calibers are present, suitable sections of their ammunition columns must be taken. The figures in tables just above are computed on the assumption that one full regiment of 36 guns accompanies the division. In such a case the other Artillery ammunition company would serve the ammunition for other calibers.

INFANTRY AND CAVALRY AMMUNITION.

The amount of ammunition to be carried per Infantry and Cavalry rifle is as follows:

Ninety rounds per rifle with each man.
One hundred and twenty rounds per rifle in combat trains.
One hundred and twenty rounds per rifle in divisional trains.

	Men.
In a division there will be 9 regiments of Infantry of approximately 2,000 men each, or	18,000
One regiment of Cavalry of 1,200 men	1,200
Making a grand total of	19,200

Multiply by 120=2,304,000 rounds=number of rounds in divisional train.

For the machine guns it is estimated that there should be 17,500 rounds per gun with the mobile troops; 4,800 rounds per gun are to be carried with the new machine-gun equipment, thus leaving about 12,000 rounds to be carried in divisional train. There are 6 machine guns for each of the 10 regiments of Infantry and Cavalry, or 60 guns. For these we must have 720,000 rounds. Hence, we have for the total in the divisional train 2,304,000 + 720,000=3,024,000 rounds.

To carry this amount and the necessary revolver ammunition we require 104 wagons for ammunition proper and 4 for other stores, or 108 in all.

It is proposed to organize these into: An Infantry ammunition company of 54 wagons for the first echelon; an Infantry train company of 54 wagons for the second echelon; the details of organization to be as shown in tables herewith.

SUMMARY OF DIVISIONAL SERVICE.

According to the foregoing analysis, the divisional ammunition service comprises:

First battalion:
1 gun ammunition company.
1 howitzer ammunition company.
1 Infantry ammunition company.

Second battalion:
1 Artillery train company.
1 Infantry train company.

Each of these battalions should be commanded by a major, the battalion staff being as shown in table herewith.

A lieutenant colonel should be in charge of the entire divisional ammunition service, his function being to carry out the orders of the division commander as to resupply of ammunition and to coordinate the workings of all the different elements.

ARMY AMMUNITION SERVICE.

The amount of ammunition to be maintained on wheels for the eight 4.7-inch guns and the eight 6-inch howitzers of the Army Artillery should be:

	Rounds per gun.
4.7-inch guns	336
6-inch howitzers	168

The amounts carried in the combat train are:

4.7-inch guns	168
6-inch howitzers	84

thus leaving for the ammunition column:

4.7-inch guns	168
6-inch howitzers	84

For these heavy calibers it is considered that there should be in the Army ammunition column 3 caissons per gun; the first echelon to comprise 1½ caissons per gun (that is, 24 caissons in all), drawn by horses; the second echelon to comprise 1½ caissons per gun (that is, 24 in all), drawn by horses or motors.

APPENDIX III.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, February 17, 1912.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

SIR: I have the honor to respond to your note of the 8th instant, in which you ask my opinion upon the following question:

"Whether or not, under existing laws, the President has authority to call forth the Organized Militia of the States and send it into a foreign country with the Regular Army as a part of an army of occupation, especially should the United States intervene in the affairs of such country under conditions short of actual warfare?"

From very early times, in both England and this country, the militia has always been considered and treated as a military body quite distinct and different from the Regular or Standing Army, governed by different laws and rules, and equally different as to the time, place, or occasion of its service. One of the most notable points of difference is this: While the latter was in the continued service of the Government and might be called into active service at all times and in all places where armed force is required, for any purpose, the militia could be called into the actual service of the Government only in a few special cases provided for by law. Their service has always been considered as of a rather domestic character, for the protection and defense of their own country and the enforcement of its laws.

This has always been the English doctrine, and in some instances acts of Parliament have expressly forbidden the use of the militia outside of the Kingdom.

Our ancestors who framed and adopted our Constitution and early laws got their ideas of a militia, its nature, and purposes from this, and must be taken to have intended substantially the same military body, with the same limitations of the occasion and nature of their service. If they had intended to enlarge this, they would have said so, just as they have when they intended to further limit or restrict the occasion or nature of their service.

When the Constitution gives to Congress the power "to raise and support armies" and to provide "for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions" and makes the President "the commander in chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States," it is speaking of two different bodies—the one the Regular Army, in the continuous service of the Government, and liable to be called into active service at any time or in any place where armed force is required; and the other a body for domestic service and liable to be called into the service of the Government only upon the particular occasions named in the Constitution. And acts of Congress relating to the Army and the militia must have the same construction.

It is certain that it is only upon one or more of these three occasions—when it is necessary to suppress insurrections, repel invasions, or to execute the laws of the United States—that even Congress can call this militia into the service of the United States or authorize it to be done.

As "insurrection" is necessarily internal and domestic, within the territorial limits of the Nation, this portion of the sentence can afford no warrant for sending the militia to suppress it elsewhere. And even if an insurrection of our own citizens were set on foot and threateningly maintained in a foreign jurisdiction and upon our border, to send an armed force there to suppress it would be an act of war which the President can not rightfully do.

The term "to repel invasion" may be, in some respects, more elastic in its meaning. Thus, if the militia were called into the service of the General Government to repel an invasion it would not be necessary to discontinue their use at the boundary line, but they might (within certain limits, at least) pursue and capture the invading force, even beyond that line; and just as the Regular Army might be used for that purpose. This may well be held to be within the meaning of the term "to repel invasion."

Then, too, if an armed force were assembled upon our border, so near and under circumstances which plainly indicated hostility and an intended invasion, this Government might attack and capture or defeat such forces, using either the Regular Army or the militia for that purpose. This, also, would be but one of the ways of repelling an invasion.

But this is quite different from and affords no warrant for sending the militia into a foreign country in time of peace and when no invasion is made or threatened.

The only remaining occasion for calling out the militia is "to execute the laws of the Union." But this certainly means to execute such laws where, and only where, they are in force and can be executed or enforced. The Constitution or laws of the United States have no extraterritorial force, and can not be compulsorily executed beyond or outside of the territorial limits of the United States.

It is true that treaties made in pursuance of the Constitution are, equally with acts of Congress, the supreme law of the land; but their observance, outside of our own jurisdiction, can not be enforced in the same way. The observance and performance, outside of our own jurisdiction, of treaty stipulations and obligations are left much to the honor, good faith, and comity of the other contracting party, reenforced at times by a regard for the consequences of a breach. We can not send either the Regular Army or the militia into a foreign country to execute such treaties or our laws. Such an invasion of a foreign country would be an act of war.

Outside of our own limits "the laws of the Union" are not executed by armed force, either regular or militia.

The Constitution had already given to Congress the unlimited power to declare war at any time and for whatever cause it chose. It did not, in this provision, attempt the useless thing of giving to Congress an additional power to declare war, or to afford an additional ground for doing so.

What is certainly meant by this provision is that Congress shall have power to call out the militia in aid of the civil power for the peaceful execution of the laws of the Union, wherever such laws are in force, and may be compulsorily executed, much as a sheriff may call upon the posse comitatus to peacefully disperse a riot or execute the laws.

Under our Constitution, as it has been uniformly construed from the first, the military is subordinate and subservient to the civil power, and it can be called upon to execute the laws of the Union only in aid of the civil power, and where the civil power has jurisdiction of such enforcement. Even the Regular Army can be thus called upon only on such occasions; and, certainly, the militia can not be thus called upon at any other.

Then, as the civil power is without force in a foreign country, and as even the Regular Army can not be sent into another country to there execute the laws of the Union, it follows that the Constitution confers no power to send the militia into a foreign country for the purpose stated in the question here considered. On the contrary, by its specific enumeration of the only occasions for calling out the militia, it clearly forbids this.

In all this I am not unmindful that nations sometimes do make hostile demonstrations and use armed force to compel the observance by another nation of its treaty obligations and sometimes send armed forces into another country to protect the lives and rights of its own citizens there.

I shall briefly notice these in their aplication to our own country, its Constitution, and laws. It will be observed, and as controlling and conclusive of the present question, that in case of a hostile demonstration against or a forcible attack upon another nation to enforce its treaty obligations or to punish their infraction there is no question involved of executing the laws of the invading nation, for such laws have no force or existence there. While the Constitution makes itself and the laws and treaties in pursuance thereof the supreme law of the land, it is only in our own land where such laws are supreme or of any force. As to the other contracting party, a treaty is a mere compact, depending for its observance upon the good faith, comity, or other moral considerations. The Constitution can not make itself or the treaties or laws made under it the supreme law of any other nation or give to either any force or existence beyond our own borders. So that when an armed force is used to compel the observance of treaty obligations or to punish or to obtain compensation for their violation there is no question of executing any law of the Union, for there is no such law there. It is but the forcible compelling of the observance of an agreement or compensation for its breach. The provision referred to does not warrant the use of the militia for this purpose.

Just so it is when in troublous times an army of occupation, large or small, is sent into a foreign country to protect the lives and the rights of our own citizens. Here, too, no law of the Union is being executed by such invasion, for no law of the Union exists or can be enforced there.

While it is the duty of every nation to afford proper protection to foreigners who are lawfully within its borders, yet this is not because of any law of the nation of which such foreigners are subjects, for no such laws exist or have any force there. No one can say in such a case that we are executing or enforcing any law of the Union. We are but aiding or compelling the foreign government to execute its own laws and to perform its own duty. As no law of the Union is being executed by such invasion, the militia can not be called out under this provision to take part in it. As no law of the Union can exist or be in force in any foreign country, the militia can not be called out to enforce any such law there.

The plain and certain meaning and effect of this constitutional provision are to confer upon Congress the power to call out the militia "to execute the laws of the Union" within our own borders, where, and where only, they exist, have any force, or can be executed by anyone. This confers no power to send the militia into a foreign country to execute our laws, which have no existence or force there, and can not be there executed.

If authority is needed for the conclusion here reached, the following may suffice:

In Ordronaux, Constitutional Legislation, page 501, it is said:

"The Constitution distinctly enumerates the three exclusive purposes for which the militia may be called into service of the United States. These purposes are: First, to execute the laws of the Union; second, to suppress insurrection; and third, to repel invasions.

"These three occasions, representing necessities of a strictly domestic character, plainly indicate that the services required of the militia can be rendered only upon the soil of the United States or of its Territories * * *. In the history of this provision of the Constitution there is nothing indicating that it was even contemplated that such troops should be employed for purposes of offensive warfare outside the limits of the United States. And it is but just to infer that the enumeration of the specific occasions on which alone the militia can be called into the service of the General Government was intended as a distinct limitation upon their employment.

"Being the ministers of the law to enforce its commands they can only be summoned by the law-making power to act within the extent of its jurisdiction and in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. They can not consequently be used to invade the territory of a neighboring country or to enforce any public rights abroad * * *.

"The militia of the States, restricted to domestic purposes alone, are to be distinguished therefore from the Army proper of the United States, which, whether in the form of Regular troops or Volunteers, may be used to invade a foreign country as well as to repel the attack of foreign enemies."

And in Von Holtz, Constitutional Law, page 170, it is said, "the militia can not be taken out of the country."

In Kneedler v. Lane (45 Pa. St., 238) Judge Strong, speaking for the court, said:

"Apart from the obligations assumed by treaty it is well known that there are many other cases where the rights of a nation and of its citizens can not be protected or vindicated within its own boundaries. But the power conferred by Congress over the militia is insufficient to enable the fulfillment of the demands of such treaties, or to protect the rights of the Government, or its citizens, in those cases in which protection must be sought beyond the territorial limits of the country."

And see Houston v. Moore (5 Wheat., 1) and Martin v. Mott (12 Wheat., 19, 27).

It is true that the act of January 21, 1903, as amended by the act of May 27, 1908 (35 Stat., pt. 1, 399), provides:

"That whenever the President calls forth the Organized Militia of any State, Territory, or of the District of Columbia, to be employed in the service of the United States, he may specify in his call the period for which such service is required, and the militia so called shall continue to serve during the term so specified, either within or without the territory of the United States, unless sooner relieved by order of the President."

But this must be read in view of the constitutional power of Congress to call forth the militia only to suppress insurrection, repel invasions, or to execute the laws of the Union. Congress can not, by its own enactment, enlarge the power conferred upon it by the Constitution; and if this provision were construed to authorize Congress to use the Organized Militia for any other than the three purposes specified it would be unconstitutional. This provision applies only to cases where, under the Constitution, said militia may be used outside of our own borders, and was doubtless inserted as a matter of precaution, and to prevent the possible recurrence of what took place in our last war with Great Britain, when portions of the militia refused to obey orders to cross the Canadian frontier.

I think that the constitutional provision here considered not only affords no warrant for the use of the militia by the General Government, except to suppress insurrection, repel invasions, or to execute the laws of the Union, but, by its careful enumeration of the three occasions or purposes for which the militia may be used, it forbids such use for any other purpose; and your question is answered in the negative.

Respectfully,

GEO. W. WICKERSHAM,
Attorney General.

APPENDIX IV.

A bill to further increase the efficiency of the Organized Militia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That under such regulations as the Secretary of War, after conference with the National Militia Board, shall prescribe, commissioned officers on the active list belonging to organizations of the Organized Militia of each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia participating in the apportionment of the annual appropriation provided by section 1661, Revised Statutes, as amended, shall receive compensation for their services, except during periods of service for which under existing law or the provisions of section 5 of this act they may become entitled to the same pay as officers of corresponding grades of the Regular Army, at the rate of certain percentages of the pay of officers of like grade in the Regular Army, not including longevity pay, as now provided by law, namely: Five per cent to all general officers commanding a division or brigade, the authorized officers constituting the division staff or brigade staff, including authorized officers detailed for duty therewith, the division and brigade inspectors of small arms practice, if any, the authorized aids, and chaplains; 20 per cent to commanding officers of companies, troops, batteries, and ambulance companies, and to adjutants and quartermasters of regiments, independent battalions or squadrons, or Coast Artillery districts; 15 per cent to all other officers belonging to regiments or smaller tactical units or Coast Artillery districts, including medical officers detailed or assigned to and doing duty with regiments or smaller tactical units or Coast Artillery districts, medical officers serving with field hospitals, and veterinarians.

SEC. 2. That under such regulations as the Secretary of War, after conference with the National Militia Board, shall prescribe, each enlisted man on the active list belonging to organizations of the Organized Militia of each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia participating in the apportionment of the annual appropriation provided by section 1661, Revised Statutes, as amended, shall receive compensation for his services, except during periods of service for which under existing law or the provisions of section 5 of this act he may become entitled to the same pay as an enlisted man of corresponding grade in the Regular Army, at a rate equal to 25 per cent of the initial pay now provided by law for enlisted men of corresponding grades of the Regular Army: Provided, That such enlisted man shall receive the compensation herein provided if he shall have attended not less than 45 regular drills during any one year, and a proportionate amount for attendance upon a lesser number of such drills, not less than 20: Provided further, That the compensation provided herein shall be computed for semiannual periods, beginning the 1st day of January and the 1st day of July of each year, in proportion to the number of drills attended; and no compensation shall be paid to any enlisted man for the first semiannual period of any year unless he shall have attended during said period at least 20 drills, but any lesser number of drills attended during said period shall be reckoned with the drills attended during the second semiannual period in computing the compensation, if any, due him for that year: Provided further, That when any man enters into an enlistment other than an immediate reenlistment he shall be entitled to proportional compensation for that year if during the remainder of the year he shall attend a number of drills whose ratio to 20 is not less than the ratio of the part of the year so served to the whole year; and when any man's enlistment shall expire the compensation, if any, to which he may be entitled shall be determined in like manner: And provided further, That periods of any actual military duty equivalent to the drills herein prescribed, except those periods of service for which under existing law or the provisions of section 5 of this act members of the Organized Militia may become entitled to the same pay as officers and enlisted men of the corresponding grades in the Regular Army, may be accepted as service in lieu of such drills when so provided by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 3. That all amounts appropriated for the purposes of this act shall be disbursed and accounted for by the officers and agents of the Pay Department of the Army, and all disbursements under the provisions of the two preceding sections shall be made as soon as practicable after the 31st day of December and the 30th day of June of each year upon pay rolls prepared and authenticated in the manner prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided, That stoppages may be made against the compensation payable to any officer or enlisted man hereunder to cover the cost of public property lost or destroyed by and chargeable to such officer or enlisted man.

SEC. 4. That no money appropriated under the provisions of this act shall be paid to any person not on the active list, nor to any person over 64 years of age, nor to any person who fails to qualify as to fitness for military service under such regulations as the Secretary of War, after conference with the National Militia Board, shall prescribe, and who has not voluntarily, in addition to his oath as a member of the Organized Militia, also agreed to render military service to the United States as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 5. That the President, with the consent of Congress, in time of war or when war is imminent, or in other grave emergency requiring the use of troops in excess of the Regular Army beyond the limits of the United States, may by order transfer to the Army of the United States any portion of the Organized Militia receiving or entitled to receive the benefits of this act to serve therein for the balance of their respective terms of enlistment or commission, unless sooner released by order of the President, and any Organized Militia so transferred shall from the date specified in the order of such transfer become for the time being a part of the Army of the United States and subject to the same laws in so far as the same may be applicable to them during their service under such transfer, excluding the retirement laws, and be entitled to the same pay, emoluments, and allowances as officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army of the same grade and the same prior service, and shall be available for any duty for which the Regular Army or Volunteer Army may be employed: Provided, That any member of the Organized Militia who, having agreed to render military service to the United States under the provisions of this act, neglects or refuses to present himself for service when so transferred, shall be subject to trial therefor by a duly constituted court-martial under such regulations as the President may prescribe: Provided further, That when in the discretion of the President the necessity for their further such use no longer exists, he shall release said organizations and the members thereof from liability to render further service under said order of transfer, and said organizations and the members thereof when so released shall cease to be a part of the Army of the United States.

SEC. 6. That whenever organizations are called into the service of the United States under existing law, or are transferred to the Army of the United States under the provisions of this act, those organizations only must be taken into such service or transferred to such Army which have already received compensation under the provisions of this act, and, in addition thereto, such other organizations as have become entitled to receive compensation hereunder between the time of the last semiannual disbursement and the time when such call or transfer is made. Organizations which at the date when called into the service of the United States or transferred to the Army of the United States are, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, organized so far as practicable as prescribed by law and regulations for like organizations of the Regular Army and are entitled to pay under this act, shall be taken by regiments brigades, divisions, or independent and separate organizations as the quota in each State, Territory, or the District of Columbia or major fraction thereof may require, including all regimental, brigade, and division staff officers authorized by law and regulations for the corresponding units of the Regular Army or specially authorized by law for the Organized Militia: Provided, That divisions, brigades, regiments, and battalions or squadrons may be organized by the President out of lesser separate units called into the service of the United States or transferred to the Army of the United States as herein provided, and the President may then appoint commanders of such organizations and their respective staffs from officers of the Regular Army or of the Organized Militia: Provided further, That the positions of chief of staff and assistant chief of staff shall be left vacant in each division headquarters entitled to pay hereunder, and such vacancies shall be filled by appointment by the President when the division is called into the service of the United States or transferred to the Army of the United States.

SEC. 7. That when the Organized Militia is called into the service of the United States, or by transfer as hereinbefore provided becomes a part of the Army of the United States, and is employed in conjunction with the Regular or Volunteer forces of the United States, and military operations require the presence of two or more officers of the same grade in the same field, department, or command, or of organizations thereof, the President may assign the command of the forces of such field, department, or command, or of organizations thereof, without regard to seniority of rank in the same grade: Provided, That in the absence of such assignment by the President officers of the same grade shall rank and have precedence in the following order, without regard to the date of rank or commission as between officers of the different classes, viz: First, officers of the Regular Army and officers of the Marine Corps detached for service with the Army by orders of the President; second, officers of the Organized Militia transferred to the Army of the United States or called into the service of the United States; third, officers of the Volunteer forces: Provided further, That officers of the Regular Army holding commissions in the Organized Militia in the service of the United States or in organizations transferred to the Army of the United States as hereinbefore provided, or in the Volunteer forces, shall rank and have precedence under said commissions as if they were commissions in the Regular Army, but the rank of officers of the Regular Army under their commission in the Organized Militia shall not for the purpose of this section be held to antedate their formal entry into the service of the United States under said commissions.

SEC. 8. That all expenses necessary to the enforcement of this act, including the actual and necessary expense of travel of officers of the Army when traveling on duty pursuant to orders issued by the governors of the several States and Territories, or the commanding general of the Organized Militia of the District of Columbia, shall be payable out of any appropriation made to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of War shall cause to be annually estimated the amount necessary for carrying out the provisions in this act, and no money shall be expended hereunder except as shall from time to time be appropriated: Provided, That this act shall take effect July 1, 1913.

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] such remaining time as he may desire.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, nearly every day now we read of some article or some speech attacking the provision in the Panama Canal bill which Congress passed last summer in regard to the question of tolls, and particularly that portion of the law which exempted coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls. I do not propose to take very much time on the subject. It seems to me there is a concerted effort being made to discredit the action of Congress. Whether that effort proceeds in part from the activity of the transcontinental railways whose rates of fare are likely, or at least liable, to be affected seriously by the reduction of the cost of carriage by water I do not undertake at this time to say, but I read the other day a published statement attempting to discredit the action of Congress by the assumption that when that bill was under consideration in the House and in the Senate there were no Members present to speak of, and those who were here were worn out and too tired to think.

I quote some language from this publication as follows:

> We must all realize as we look back that when that provision was adopted the Members of both Houses were much exhausted; we were weary physically and mentally. Such discussion as there was was to empty seats. In neither House of Congress during the period that this provision was under discussion could there be found more than a scant dozen or two of Members.

It is unnecessary in the House, so far as membership of the House is concerned, to state that that statement is without foundation, because we all remember that in the discussion of the Panama Canal bill, and particularly of the Doremus amendment or substitute which was finally agreed to, the membership of the House was quite generally present; and I have seldom seen in my service in the House as large a membership of the House present when any discussion was being carried on.

But the statement that only a scant dozen or two Members of the House who were worn out is an assumption that the action of the House was without proper consideration, and is a reflection not only upon the House but the action which the House took.

The Doremus amendment or substitute for section 5 of the Panama Canal bill was, by consent of the House, printed in the RECORD of May 18. It was disposed of in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on May 21. It was disposed of in the House itself on May 23; and May, by the way, was before the membership of the House was tired out, if they were tired out at all, which I did not observe during the session.

Let me give a few votes which were taken in Committee of the Whole to show whether there were only a scant dozen or two Members of the House present during the discussion.

In the Adamson committee amendment there was a division, and the ayes were 83 and the noes were 43.

On the Adamson amendment to the Goldfogle amendment, on the same section, the ayes were 52 and the noes were 63.

On the Sims amendment to the Goldfogle amendment the ayes were 44 and the noes were 66.

On the Goldfogle amendment itself, on a division, the ayes were 33 and the noes were 80.

On the Good amendment to the Doremus substitute the ayes were 24 and the noes were 99.

On the Doremus substitute, on a division, the ayes were 91 and the noes were 91; and on tellers being ordered, the ayes were 100 and the noes were 90.

On the final vote in the House the ayes were 147 and the noes were 128, "present" 8.

Mr. Chairman, I throw this into the RECORD because I am somewhat tired at some of the statements that are being made by extremely high authority for the purpose of making the country believe that that provision in the Panama Canal bill was without consideration by the House, and that action was taken in the absence of Members of the House. While I shall not quote the record in the Senate, it would bear analysis very much to the same effect.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are told that we were wrong in the action that we took; that the Panama Canal act should be submitted to some form of arbitration. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty is given as the basis for the claim that we do not have the authority to exempt our coastwise trade from the payment of tolls through this canal, and that claim is based upon paragraph 1, article 3, of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. That paragraph reads:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Paragraph 3 of the same article provides:

> Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary, and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Paragraph 4 of the same article provides:

> No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

Paragraph 5 of the same article provides:

> The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

Paragraph 1 reads:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations—

And the claim is made that that puts us upon the same terms precisely as any other nation. If that be true as to merchant marine, it is also true as to vessels of war. There is no distinction in the treaty in that paragraph between war vessels and merchant vessels. If we have no authority under the provisions of this treaty to give preference to our merchant marine, then we have no authority to give preference to our war vessels; and if this treaty applies to our merchant marine, it also applies to the war vessels; and if it applies to the war vessels, if we happen to be at war with any country, then we can not keep one of our war vessels anywhere within 3 miles of either end of the canal for more than 24 hours except in case of distress, and in case of distress the vessel must depart as soon as possible. Do we propose to submit to arbitration the question of whether in time of war with some other country we can maintain one of our warships within 3 miles of either end of the canal? Yet it is perfectly plain that if we can give no preference to the merchant marine, we have no authority to keep a war vessel, in time of war with any other country, within 3 miles of either end of the canal.

Mr. Chairman, to a certain extent we gave construction to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Shortly after the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we negotiated a treaty with the Republic of Colombia. There is no exception in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as to Colombia, and in that treaty which we negotiated with Colombia, though it never was ratified by the Republic of Colombia, it is provided in article 17:

The Government of Colombia shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels, troops, and munitions of war at all times without paying charges of any kind.

If the provisions of the treaty apply to vessels of all nations, including the United States, they must also apply to the Republic of Colombia, and yet immediately after we had negotiated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we negotiated this treaty with Colombia. Again, we negotiated a treaty with the Republic of Panama, in which we provided in article 19:

That the Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war, in such vessels at all times, without paying charges of any kind.

That treaty is in force, but that is not the only treaty that we negotiated. So distinguished a man as the Hon. ELIHU ROOT, when he was Secretary of State, negotiated a treaty with the Republic of Panama, and another with the Republic of Colombia, and in the treaty with the Republic of Colombia, negotiated by Secretary of State ELIHU ROOT, it was provided:

The Republic of Colombia shall have liberty at all times to convey through the ship canal now in course of construction by the United States across the Isthmus of Panama the troops, materials for war, and ships of war of the Republic of Colombia without paying any duty to the United States, even in the case of an international war between Colombia and another country.

Yet it is reported that certain gentlemen of high authority have recently declared that under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we have no right to make any discrimination in favor of ourselves, much less the Republic of Colombia. While it is true that this treaty is not in effect, because it was not ratified by the Republic of Colombia, yet it was negotiated by our Secretary of State and ratified and approved by the Senate of the United States. [Applause.] It is not our fault that it is not existing law as a treaty.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, was any protest made by any foreign nation at the time of the negotiation of any of these treaties to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. MANN. There was no protest by any foreign nation at the time. I do not think that any foreign nation ever dreamed that there was no authority on the part of the United States to grant the preference which we have granted until after the transcontinental railroads got busy. [Applause.]

The following illuminating article on this subject has been prepared by the chief law officer of the Isthmian Canal Commission, Hon. Frank Feuille, and ought to be read by everyone interested, and by unanimous consent is herewith inserted:

"PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

"The provision of the Panama Canal act, recently enacted by Congress, which discriminates in favor of American coastwise shipping and the vessels of the Republic of Panama, has brought forth a protest from the British Government and unfavorable comment from the press at home and abroad.

"It is claimed that the United States have violated treaty obligations in exempting American ships from toll charges at the canal; that in consenting to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty Great Britain surrendered valuable rights held by her under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; that without the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the United States could not build and maintain the canal alone; and that the surrender of her rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty constituted a valid consideration entitling Great Britain to equal treatment for her ships with those of the United States at the canal. The question is a historical one to some extent. It might be well to refer briefly to the history of the subject.

"In 1850 the United States and Great Britain entered into an agreement, commonly known as the Clayton-Bulwer convention, to promote the building of a canal by the Nicaraguan route and, when constructed, to jointly protect it against unjust detention, confiscation, seizure, or any violation whatsoever. The contracting parties also agreed that neither would erect fortifications at the canal or its vicinity, and that neither would directly or indirectly obtain the exclusive benefit of the canal or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America. The Mosquito Coast, over which Great Britain was then attempting to exercise jurisdiction, is situated in the vicinity of the Atlantic entrance of the proposed Nicaraguan Canal.

"The United States had two purposes in view in making the convention—to stop Great Britain's encroachment upon Central American territory and to remove the obstruction at the Atlantic entrance of the canal resulting from the English assumption of jurisdiction over the Mosquito coast.

"One of the important provisions of the treaty was that prohibiting any discrimination in the use of the canal in favor of either of the contracting parties as against the other. The point is covered in the following explicit language:

"The Government of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the ship canal; * * * nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess, with any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

"There are other provisions to the same effect in the treaty. It is significant that the explicit language of the Clayton-Bulwer convention in respect to equality of treatment of the contracting parties was not employed in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. This will be discussed later on in this paper.

"The convention applied to the Nicaraguan route and to Central America and not to the Panama route or South America, of which the Isthmus of Panama forms a part.

"It is true that article 8 of the treaty did obligate the parties to extend their protection by treaty stipulations to the Panama route or the Tehauntepec route, but no such treaty stipulations were ever effected.

"Inasmuch as article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention is referred to in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it might be well to quote it here at length:

"ART. 8. The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

"When the Clayton-Bulwer convention was made the United States was under treaty obligations with New Granada, now Colombia, to guarantee positively and efficaciously to that Goverment the perfect neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama, with the view that the free transit from one to the other sea might not be interrupted or embarrassed while the treaty existed, and, in consequence, the United States also guaranteed in the same manner the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada possessed over said territory. In other words, the United States was exercising a protectorate over the Isthmus of Panama in 1850, when the Clayton-Bulwer convention was made. In return for the protection afforded the Government of New Granada, the United States were to enjoy all the exemptions, privileges, and immunities concerning commerce and navigation which then or thereafter might be enjoyed by Granadian citizens, their vessels, and merchandise; and this equality of favors was to extend to the passengers, correspondence, and merchandise of the United States in their transit across the said territory from one sea to the other upon any means of communication established or to be established.

"The Clayton-Bulwer convention did not impair the treaty between the United States and New Granada. Doubtless the existence of the latter treaty caused article 8 to be inserted in the Clayton-Bulwer convention so that by further treaty stipulations that convention could be made extensive to Panama with the consent of New Granada. Without a material modification of the treaty with the latter country, the Clayton-Bulwer convention could not have been applied to Panama.

"However, no treaty stipulations for the extension of the Clayton-Bulwer convention to the Panama Canal were ever effected, and therefore that convention only applied to the Nicaraguan route and Central America.

"The Clayton-Bulwer convention remained in existence for 51 years—that is to say, from 1850 to 1901—when it was superseded by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and in all that time nothing of consequence was done by Great Britain to promote the construction of the canal. Hence the claim that the Clayton-Bulwer convention had become obsolete has some merit.

"No one familiar with the trend of public opinion in the United States but knows that the American people had concluded to build the canal independently of any other nation when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made, and had not that treaty been entered into there is no doubt that the moribund convention of 1850 would have been abrogated by our Government in response to popular demand.

"The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, made in 1901, did not affect the treaty made between the United States and New Granada, or Colombia as it is now called, respecting the Isthmus of Panama. Hence the United States, without interruption, has been under treaty obligations since 1846 to protect the Panama route and to maintain the neutrality of transit over the Isthmus. Neither the Clayton-Bulwer convention nor the Hay-Pauncefote treaty relieved the United States of the burden; and the preferential treatment accorded to the commerce of the United States across the Isthmus of Panama, in compensation for that burden, was not diminished or impaired by either of the conventions between England and the United States above mentioned. The right held by the United States under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was equivalent to an easement over the Isthmus of Panama, and this easement ripened into a fee-simple title when the treaty with Panama was made in 1903. Whence comes England's right to claim equal treatment with the United States at the Isthmus? She did not get it under the Clayton-Bulwer convention nor by virtue of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The treaty between the United States and Panama added nothing to England's rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The Clayton-Bulwer convention and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty left the status at the Isthmus unchanged under which the United States held special commercial privileges over that territory. That the United States are now the owners of the territory, instead of being the holders of an easement, can not change the status. Hence the United States now have rights, commercial and otherwise, at the Isthmus superior to those of England, as they have had since 1846.

"It is claimed by Great Britain that the consideration for superseding the Clayton-Bulwer convention was to secure equality of treatment for her ships with those of the United States at the canal. There is no such consideration expressed in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty nor in the correspondence between the two Governments leading to the making of that treaty; nor does such a consideration arise by implication from a correct reading of the instrument. But a fair construction of it would permit of the suggestion that England's prime motive was to obtain the use of a shorter route to the Pacific through a canal built without cost to her, and the neutrality of which was to be maintained by the United States singly and alone. If Great Britain's contentions were correct, the benefit to the United States from the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer convention would not be apparent. The English contention means that the United States renounced all benefits under the Clayton-Bulwer convention and yet retained the burdens and obligations of that instrument, not only in respect to England but the other nations of the world as well, although they were not parties to the convention; and these burdens must be assumed in regard to a canal over which the Clayton-Bulwer convention could not have been extended without further treaty stipulations with New Granada as a party. Surely the burden is upon the party asserting such a claim to establish it by satisfactory evidence beyond doubt.

"If the claim of Great Britain is conceded that she surrendered certain rights in respect to the Nicaraguan Canal when she consented to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, she, in turn, was relieved of the joint obligation to promote the building of the canal and to protect it and maintain its neutrality when built. It is fair to assume that the latter compensated for the former. Be that as it may, Great Britain agreed to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that treaty superseded the Clayton-Bulwer convention.

"But Great Britain will receive other considerations of incalculable value to her for agreeing to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer convention. Her tonnage in steam and sailing vessels is greater than that of the other maritime nations combined. It is not unfair to Great Britain to say that the relative advantage to come to her from the opening of the canal will be in like proportion, and her great superiority over the other nations in tonnage will give her a most-favored position in the trade with the west coast of this hemisphere.

"She has great possessions in Asia and Australia and other parts of Oceanica; the Panama Canal will give her another highway to reach them.

"The benefits to come to her from the canal will not stop here. We know that British America is larger than the United States, excluding Alaska; and British Columbia, in the western part of Canada, contains vast lumber regions and immense wheat fields, which are just beginning to be developed. The opening of the canal will turn immigration toward the Canadian Pacific, and the future should bring a flourishing trade between that region and Great Britain in the exchange of manufactures for Canadian wheat and lumber.

"But these are not all the advantages which England will obtain from the canal. Canada has hundreds of miles of coast on the Atlantic and three or four hundred miles of coast on the Pacific, and is traversed by transcontinental railroads. These conditions will make British America a most valuable base for the operations of the English navy in both oceans when the canal is built, and thus the efficiency of England's navy will be increased almost equally with our own.

"These are some of the benefits that England is to receive from the canal. It is fair to assume that she considered them sufficient to compensate her for agreeing to the abrogation of the almost forgotten Clayton-Bulwer convention, so that there might be no obstacle to the building of the canal by the United States. Were the Panama Canal project abandoned at this time England would probably be injured by the abandonment as much as the United States, and yet the burden of building the canal and of maintaining its neutrality thereafter is entirely on the United States. England has no obligations in that respect.

"However, if we are under treaty obligations to treat England's ships on an equality with our own at the canal, it is our duty to respect them. But have we assumed such obligations? An answer to the question depends on the meaning of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The treaty was made in Washington on the 19th day of November, 1901. Its purpose, as declared in the preamble, was to remove any objection which might arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, known as the Clayton-Bulwer convention, to the construction of the canal under the auspices of the United States, without impairing the 'general principle' of neutralization established under article 8 of that convention. The articles of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are so interdependent that it is necessary to construe them together in order to get at the true meaning of the instrument, and for that purpose they are here set out in full:

"ARTICLE 1. The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th of April, 1850.

"ART. 2. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

"ART. 3. The United States adopts, as the basis of neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the Convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th day of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say—

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

"2. The canal shall never be blockaded nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

"3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service. Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of belligerents.

"4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hinderance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

"5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

"6. The plant, establishment, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be a part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

"ART. 4. It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the aforementioned canal shall affect the general principles of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

"Those articles contain all the material provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

"The declaration in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that it is not intended to impair the general principle of neutralization established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention has been urged against any proposition to favor American ships at the canal.

"The argument is based on the assumption that the terms 'general principle of neutralization,' used in the preamble, include traffic conditions within their scope and meaning. But the assumption is not justified. They mean immunity from attack and nothing else. It is true the article in question does provide that the canal shall be open to the citizens and subjects of United States and Great Britain on equal terms, but that was simply a statement of the consideration to each of the two contracting parties for the protection they were to extend to the canal. There are two separate elements expressed in the article—one, the protection of the canal, and the other the equality of treatment of the contracting parties in return for that protection.

"The general principle which the parties desired to extend to the Panama route was one of protection; that is to say, neutralization. That proposition is expressed in the first sentence of the article. The equality of treatment of the contracting parties is another thought expressing the consideration in return for the protection of the canal, and is found in the second sentence of the same article. The term 'neutralization' is not employed by international law writers to mean equality of treatment in respect to traffic conditions. The evident purpose of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was to secure immunity from attack for the canal. No other meaning can be given to the word 'neutralization.'

"The language of article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is quite clear and, unless its terms are modified by some subsequent provisions of that treaty, it concedes to the United States the enjoyment of all of the rights incident to the construction of the canal as well as the exclusive right for the regulation and management of the same. Is there any provision in the treaty which modifies article 2? It will be noted that the provisions relating to neutrality provided for in the Clayton-Bulwer convention are announced therein by the United States and Great Britain jointly, while in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the United States alone establishes the rules. The partnership arrangement existing between the two countries under the Clayton-Bulwer convention has terminated, and the rules for the neutralization of the canal under the later treaty were enacted by the United States and must be maintained by that Government alone. Those rules are to be observed by other nations and not by the United States. If this statement is true, then the rule of equality does not apply to the United States.

"Great Britain's contention is that rule 1 does apply to the United States, and that, in effect, would be reading into the rule the words 'with the vessels of the United States,' so that the language of the rule, then, would be as follows:

"The canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality with the vessels of the United States.

"We do not believe that any such construction can be given to rule 1, if read in the light of the other provisions of the treaty.

"The language of article 2 is very clear and affirmative:

"The United States shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to the construction of the canal, as well as the exclusive right of providing for its regulation and management.

"These words can not be limited or impaired by implication. It requires an express provision in the treaty to minimize their effect, and none such can be found therein.

"The claim now advanced by Great Britain is confined to the subject of canal tolls, but with equal propriety it might include all benefits given to American vessels of war or commerce at the canal. The rule of equality is not limited to canal tolls, but relates to any discrimination in respect to the charges or conditions of traffic or otherwise, and includes vessels of war and vessels of commerce; consequently, no favors could be shown to our warships in the use of dry docks, anchorage basins, pilotage, coaling privileges, commissaries, and other conveniences at the canal without extending like privileges to foreign war vessels.

"Those who denied our right to fortify the canal relied on the broad language of the rule to sustain their contention, and if England's claim in respect to tolls is correct it would seem that the objection made to our fortifying the canal would be equally well taken. If the rule of equality places American ships on the same basis with foreign ships, then our belligerent vessels will not be authorized to revictual or take any stores in the canal except when strictly necessary, and all the other rules restricting the use of the canal by belligerents will apply to us. However, that doctrine has not been admitted by the people of the United States, and, for that matter, England has recognized our right to fortify the canal and to do anything necessary to protect it, and that carries with it an admission of a superior right in our warships to the use of the canal.

"The British protest assumes that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty did not admit of the United States protecting the territory on which the canal was to be built because the United States was not then the owner of it. The protest overlooks the important fact that at that very time the United States was under treaty obligation with Colombia to maintain the neutrality of the Isthmus and to guarantee the sovereignty right of that country therein, and that treaty obligation was not diminished in any respect by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Again, when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was first submitted to the Senate it contained a provision to prohibit the United States from fortifying the canal. The Senate rejected the provision, and England accepted the treaty with the provision eliminated. In discussing the elimination of that provision, Lord Lansdowne, in a memorandum dated August 3, 1901, used this language:

"In my dispatch I pointed out the dangers of a construction in which one clause permitted the adoption of defensive measures while another prohibited the erection of fortifications. It is most important that no doubt should exist as to the intention of the contracting parties. As to this I understand that by the omission of all reference to the matter of defense the United States desire to reserve the power to protect the canal at any time when the United States may be at war from destruction or damage at the hands of an enemy or enemies. On the other hand, I conclude that with the above exception there is no intention to derrogate from the principles of neutrality laid down by the rules. As to the first of these propositions I am not prepared to deny that contingencies may arise when not only from a national point of view but in behalf of the commercial interests of the whole world it might be of supreme importance to the United States that they should be free to adopt measures for the defense of the canal at a moment when they were themselves engaged in hostilities.

"It is also to be borne in mind that, owing to the omission of the words under which this country became jointly bound to defend the neutrality of the canal and the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the obligations of Great Britain will be materially diminished.

"Thus we see that the attempt to make the rules of neutrality applicable to the United States was without success. So that our right to fortify the canal may be said to be well established, and the right to fortify carries with it the further right to use the canal with our belligerent ships when necessary to prevent hostile fleets or armies from entering the canal. If ships of war and of commerce and other nations have an equal right with those of the United States in the matter of tolls it would be difficult for our Government to maintain that our belligerent ships have more rights in the canal than those of any other belligerent. Inasmuch as the burden of maintaining the neutrality of the canal is upon the United States alone, it follows that our warships are not within the rule of equality laid down in rule 1, and that being so, it would be playing fast and loose with the rule to include our commercial vessels within its provisions and not do likewise with our vessels of war.

"In discussing the belligerent rights of the United States at the canal, the British note of protest of November 14, 1912, says:

"Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

"The writer of the protest does not seem to have had in mind the fact that the United States has been under treaty obligations since 1846 to protect the Isthmus and to maintain the neutrality of the transit across it, and that Lord Lansdowne, during the negotiations for the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, recognized not only our right, but that it was our duty to protect the canal. Were we so inclined, we might rest our case on the admission contained in the protest, that the acquisition by the United States of the territory over which the canal is being constructed was sufficient of itself to modify the treaty so as to accord belligerent rights to our warships. If the acquisition of the territory will thus benefit our war vessels, it is hard to conceive how equal favors to our vessels of commerce are to be withheld under such circumstances. At least one distinguished American diplomat has maintained that the acquisition by the United States of the canal strip did change the treaty status so as to authorize the exemption of American merchant ships from the payment of tolls. No doubt he will be pleased at discovering that Great Britain in her protest lends comfort to his views.

"Viewed in the light of the circumstances and conditions attending the execution of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and construing rule 1 in connection with the other terms of the instrument, that rule simply amounts to what is known in treaties as 'the most-favored-nation clause.' In other words, the rule means that the nations observing the rules of neutralization laid down in the treaty by the United States shall be preferred in the use of the canal without discrimination in favor of one of such nations as against the other.

"It has been said that language substantially the same as that of rule 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is employed in the treaty of Washington between the United States and Great Britain relating to the Canadian and American canals and the use of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River, and that discrimination in favor of the ships of either of the contracting parties is not allowed under the latter treaty. It is true that entire equality is observed in the treatment of vessels of the parties to the Washington treaty, but it is so because the treaty itself clearly and affirmatively prohibits a discrimination in favor of one of the parties as against the other. The statement that the language of the Washington treaty is substantially that of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is incorrect. Article 27 of the Washington treaty leaves nothing to inference, but expressly says that Great Britain will engage to urge upon the Canadian Government to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion; and the United States engages that the subjects of Great Britain shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States, and engages to urge upon the State governments to secure to the subjects of Great Britain the use of the several State canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line between the possessions of the high contracting parties on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

"Here we have unequivocal declarations that there shall be equality of treatment between the contracting parties. There is no such declaration in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

"It has also been said that the rule of equality, as expressed in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, is the same as that laid down in the Suez Canal convention. But again we say that the statement is not correct. Article 1 of the Suez convention reads as follows:

"The Suez Maritime Canal shall always be free and open in time of war as in time of peace to every vessel of commerce or of war without distinction of flag.

"The words 'without distinction of flag,' which I have underscored, make the meaning quite clear that all nations shall stand upon an equal footing. There is no such language in rule 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

"The correspondence between the United States and Great Britain leading up to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty throws much light on the subject. Rule 1 received the most serious consideration in the diplomatic negotiations preceding the adoption of the treaty, and that England's great solicitude was to secure for herself equal treatment with other nations appears from Lord Lansdowne's communication to Lord Pauncefote on October 23, 1901, on this subject, in which he said in part:

"I informed the United States chargé d'affaires to-day that His Majesty's Government had given their careful attention to the various amendments which have been suggested in the draft of the inter-oceanic canal treaty, communicated by Mr. Hay to your Lordship on the 23th of April last, and that I was now in a position to inform him officially of our views.

"Mr. Hay suggested that in article 3, rule 1, we should substitute for the words 'the canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules,' etc., the words 'the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules,' and in the same clause, as a consequence of the amendment, substitute for the words 'any nation so agreeing' the words 'any such nation.' His Majesty's Government were prepared to accept this amendment, which seemed to us equally efficacious for the purpose which we had in view, namely, that of insuring that Great Britain should not be placed in a less advantageous position than any other power, while they stopped short of conferring upon other nations a contractual right to the use of the canal. [The italics are mine.]

"The reasonable inference to be drawn from the language of the English negotiator is that he was seeking to obtain the most-favored-nation clause for Great Britain, and nothing more. We must bear in mind that the Clayton-Bulwer convention contained provisions prohibiting the contracting parties from—

"Acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the subjects of the other.

"The fact that no such language was employed or sought to be employed by Great Britain in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is significant, and would seem to support the conclusion that she only desired equal treatment with other nations, especially as she had assumed no obligation in respect to the canal that would not be expected of the other nations using it; that is to say, that none of them would do any act in the canal unfriendly to the United States. That obligation rests upon all civilized nations at peace with us without the necessity of a treaty.

"But we need not leave our case here. It became necessary for the United States to enter into a treaty with the Republic of Panama to obtain the right of way across the Isthmus of Panama for the construction of the canal, and political jurisdiction over the Canal Zone. In part consideration for the cession of the canal strip by the Republic of Panama, the United States agreed that the vessels of the Panamanian Government should have free transportation over the canal at all times. This is a discrimination in favor of the vessels of Panama, inasmuch as no other nation has that privilege; but it is quite consistent with the most-favored-nation clause.

"The concession to the vessels of Panama, it is said, was necessary in order to acquire a right of way over which to build the canal, and, in consequence, the privilege granted to Panama was proper and did not militate against the proposition that the United States must treat the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality with their own vessels. The argument would create the anomalous situation in which Panama occupied a position superior to all nations, including the United States. In addition, the argument begs the question entirely. If Great Britain's claim is correct, the United States could not have made any such concession to Panamanian vessels without violating the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and, in order to keep within that treaty, some other consideration would have had to be given to Panama in lieu of the exemption accorded to her ships.

"But the concession to Panama is quite consistent with the most-favored-nation clause. That clause does not prevent the granting of a special privilege to another nation, provided a special consideration is given in return for the privilege. The most-favored-nation clause can not be understood to mean that a country should enjoy as a free gift that which is accorded to other nations for a full equivalent. That is to say, Great Britain, if she observes the rules of neutrality laid down in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, shall enjoy the canal on an equal footing with all other nations observing those rules, but the rule would be unequal as to Panama if she were required to surrender the Canal Zone to the United States besides having to observe the rules of neutrality. Hence, Panama is entitled to a free canal for her vessels, because she has given a special consideration for the privilege which the other nations have not. This doctrine has been generally recognized, and especially by Great Britain.

"The United States entered into a commercial treaty with the Hawaiian Islands in 1876 by the terms of which mutual trade concessions were made by the two Governments. At that time Great Britain and Hawaii had a treaty containing the most-favored-nation clause. The British Government admitted that—

"As the advantages conceded to the United States by the Sandwich Islands are expressly stated to be given in consideration of and as an equivalent for certain reciprocal concessions on the part of the United States, Great Britain can not as a matter of right claim the same advantages for her trade under the strict letter of the treaty of 1851.

"We do not find that Great Britain's consent was asked by the United States before the concession was made to Panaman vessels, nor does it appear that Great Britain made any protest. It is fair to assume that she recognized the right of the United States to extend the privilege of a free canal to Panaman vessels in return for the cession of the Canal Zone and jurisdiction over it to our Government. It would seem that England could not very well admit a right to the United States in this and yet contend for her present construction of rule 1—that English ships and those of other nations observing the rules are entitled to use the canal on terms of entire equality with those of the United States.

"It is true that Great Britain now protests against the exemption of Panamanian vessels, but this objection, coming, as it does, nine years after the making of the treaty when the canal is almost completed, does not deserve serious consideration. The only purpose it can serve is that of demonstrating that England now recognizes that she can not concede our right to exempt Panamanian vessels without surrendering her case.

"We might pursue the most-favored-nation theory further. On January 9, 1909, the United States, Colombia, and Panama negotiated what was known as the tripartite agreement, by which the United States granted to Colombia the right to convey through the canal her troops, materials of war, and ships of war without paying any duty to the United States. The agreement was negotiated by our State Department with the executive departments of Colombia and Panama, and was ratified by our Senate and the Assembly of Panama, but was rejected by the Congress of Colombia, and hence did not become effective. The exemption from the payment of duties at the canal in favor of Colombian vessels could have been made only upon the theory that rule 1 accords to England nothing more than most-favored-nation treatment. Although Great Britain protested against the exemption of Colombian ships, the protest does not seem to have been as insistent as the one she now presents. Notwithstanding the English protest made at the time, our State Department carried forward the agreement, our Senate ratified it, and it failed only because the Colombian Congress rejected it.

"The issue now pending with England has had full consideration by the United States Government. Our State Department, in making the canal treaty with Panama and the tripartite agreement with Colombia and Panama, and the Senate in ratifying this convention, have demonstrated that the treaty-making power of the United States has not been in accord with the English view of the subject. And now the Congress of the United States has spoken out against Great Britain's claim and has enacted the Panama Canal act, by which American shipping and the vessels of the Government of Panama are favored at the canal.

"We might still pursue the doctrine a little further that the most-favored-nation clause does not preclude a Government from granting special concessions to other nations in return for special favors. Suppose the United States, with some other maritime power as an ally, were to engage in a war. Would it be correct to say that we could not admit the belligerent ships of our ally into the canal on an equal footing with our vessels? The American people would hardly concede that, and it may well be doubted that Great Britain would admit it were she the ally.

"The issue has been discussed in this paper as though the burden were upon the United States in the argument. As a matter of fact the onus is on Great Britain to establish her contention. Great Britain, in effect, is claiming a servitude upon our property—the canal—and a limitation on our sovereignty. Her claim, if valid, means that we must tax our imports and exports and our coastwise trade passing through the canal equally with the trade of other countries using that waterway. That means a serious restriction upon the sovereign right of the United States to regulate their fiscal and economic policies as they may deem best. The restriction would amount to a limitation of our sovereignty as well as a servitude imposed upon our territory.

"It is a well-established rule of international law that one sovereign can not claim a servitude on the territory of another except by compact, and "if a dispute occurs between a territorial sovereign and a foreign power as to the extent or nature of rights enjoyed by the latter within the territory of the former, the presumption is against the foreign State, and upon it the burden lies of proving its claim beyond doubt or question."

"In summing up the objections to the British claim, we might say that the commercial advantages which the United States has at the Isthmus came from the treaty with Colombia of 1846 and not from the Clayton-Bulwer convention or the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and neither of these affected the rights so held by us; that the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, when properly construed, do not sustain it; that in abandoning the explicit language of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, which clearly prohibited a discrimination in favor of the United States, England lost her right to claim at this time equality with the United States in the use of the canal for her vessels; that Lord Lansdowne's communication of October 23, 1901, to Lord Pauncefote, already mentioned, tends to prove that England's only desire was to obtain equality of treatment with other powers for her vessels at the canal and nothing more; that the canal treaty with the Republic of Panama, by which the vessels of the Republic are entitled to the free use of the canal, made without protest from Great Britain, is a strong circumstance in support of the proposition that rule 1 is nothing more than the most-favored-nation clause expressed in another form; and, lastly, Great Britain has not produced any sufficient proof to overcome the presumption arising against her from the circumstances just related, much less has she adduced any proof or argument to establish her claim beyond doubt or question.

"Many of our citizens believe that the issue between Great Britain and the United States on the subject of canal tolls should be submitted to The Hague tribunal for determination under the provisions of the arbitration treaty between the two countries. This assumes that the question is a justiciable one. The treaty does not require all questions that may arise between the two countries to be submitted to The Hague. It does say that 'differences which may arise of a legal nature or relating to the interpretation of treaties existing between the two contracting parties, and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, shall be referred to the permanent court of arbitration,' etc. But the same clause of the treaty contains a proviso modifying the rules so laid down to the effect that neither of the parties is bound to submit questions affecting its vital interests, its independence, its honor, or the interests of third parties.

"We have seen that the issue does affect the vital interests as well as the independence of the United States, inasmuch as the English claim imposes a limitation upon our sovereignty and a servitude on our territory, so as to materially impair our right to freely adopt such economic and fiscal policies as we may deem best, and we are not at liberty to use our own with freedom. The question is a vital one and of the most serious importance to the people of the United States, because all of the maritime powers of the world are equally interested with England in obtaining a decision adverse to the United States. And yet we are expected to submit the issue to a tribunal that is controlled by these same maritime powers.

"It has been said that if the United States refused to submit the question to The Hague the arbitration treaty may as well be destroyed. The answer to that is: If the question does in fact affect our vital interests or our independence, then there is no authority for its submission to that tribunal. The proviso which excludes such questions from the jurisdiction of The Hague is just as binding on the parties as any other part of the treaty, and the necessity for its observance is accentuated when the question is one in which the powers controlling the court are vitally interested. I do not intend to reflect on The Hague tribunal, but am simply stating the facts. In this instance the judges would also be parties at interest.

"FRANK FEUILLE."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest earlier in the afternoon to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, because I happen to be a member of that committee, just as I happened to be a soldier in the Army of the United States during the War with Spain, as a direct result of which war I believe the United States has had a protectorate over those islands since 1898. I am shocked and greatly surprised at the character and the tone of the speech made by the gentleman who is chairman of that committee, not that I am surprised at some of the statements he made, because I violate no confidence when I say that some of the matters referred to by the gentleman were informally discussed by members of the Committee on Insular Affairs quite recently, and an attempt was made to decide upon the right course of action to be taken by the members of that committee. It was seriously suggested by some of the members of the committee that in view of the statements and revelations which were made by the gentleman from Virginia an investigation of the whole situation should be immediately had, and I asserted the fact that the Governor General of the Philippines, Cameron Forbes, was either in the United States at the time or he had not long since departed from our shores to resume his post at Manila. I believed we should get him by cable, if necessary, and give him the opportunity that every man who is accused falsely or justly is entitled to under our system—the right to be present when charges are made and to meet his accuser face to face.

I regret very much, in view of the fact a speech has been made this afternoon which will carry to all quarters of our country the information and belief of some people that Gov. Gen. Forbes is a grafter, that I for one did not insist upon his appearing in person to meet those charges. Like the gentleman from Kentucky who has so eloquently addressed this House during the afternoon, I know nothing about the truth or falsity of those charges, but if they are true Gov. Gen. Forbes should be impeached, and if you can convince me they are true I will vote to institute impeachment proceedings against him.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. MURRAY. I will.

Mr. JONES. I want to say to the gentleman that he misunderstood me if he understood me to say I thought that Gov. Forbes was a grafter or that he was guilty of anything of the sort.

Mr. MURRAY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I am more pained and shocked in my heart of hearts than I was by the statement, because I thought the gentleman believed the truth of the things he said, but if he before this House tells me that he does not believe the things he said here to you, I believe he has done an irreparable injury to the fame and reputation of a man who should not be slandered.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is doing me a great injustice which I can not think he means to do me.

Mr. MURRAY. I certainly did not intend to do so.

Mr. JONES. What I want to say is this, that every statement of fact made by me was true and susceptible of proof, and I will undertake to prove them, but I did not charge that Gov. Forbes was guilty of grafting. I said that a prominent American official had been charged with grafting and had been found guilty by a committee of investigation. I never believed that Gov. Forbes was personally dishonest, and nothing was further from me than to so charge or even intimate. I believe that when he undertook to disburse the public funds of the Philippines according to his own will and judgment, but without regard for the purposes set forth in the last appropriation act, he violated both the letter and the spirit of the organic act of Congress. That is all I stated. I did not charge or intimate that he was guilty of any personal guilt in the way of grafting, and my remarks are not capable of being distorted into anything of the kind.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I am delighted with what I have accomplished so far, because it has brought fairly from the chairman the expression of opinion that certainly was not clear to me during the course of his remarks during the early afternoon and what I fear was not clear to the rest of us who heard him.

Mr. JONES. My remarks will show for themselves. I shall not change a word of them.

Mr. MURRAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to offend the gentleman, and I do not believe he has any desire to offend me. I heard the great Senator from Texas a few weeks ago make a speech in the United States Senate which charmed me; and I shall never forget one thing that he said, and that was that during the time he had been here he had said some things which he wished he could erase from the record, some things which may have given offense to those with whom he has worked. That thought I would bear in mind during the time I am here; but when a statement with such careful preparation as was made by the gentleman from Virginia is made about one whose reputation I know, although I do not know him personally, I feel justified entirely in bringing from the gentleman as clear an explanation as I can.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know Cameron Forbes. I would not know him if he walked in here. But I do know his reputation, because he lives in that community whose citizens have sent me to Congress. I remember that it was only a few years ago when I was a student in a law school, and we came upon that part of our course when we were told that persons might testify in a court of law as to the reputation of those whose reputation and character were in dispute, and as a young student I could not understand the practice that would permit testimony as to reputation, while denying the right to testify as to particular incidents and things that might come to one's knowledge. But to-day I appreciate the great force and value of reputation testimony as seldom I have been able to appreciate the value of it.

I know the reputation of Cameron Forbes, even though I do not know him. He is a man of great social and financial standing and strength, and there are hundreds who would never class him as a grafter or a crook unless the statements which have been made to-day were found to be true. I read from Who's Who in America, which is the only reference I found available:

Forbes, W(illiam) Cameron, governor general; Milton, Mass.; 1870; son of William Hathaway and Edith (Emerson) F.; grandson of Ralph Waldo Emerson; A. B. Harvard, 1892; unmarried. Clerk, Jackson & Curtis, bankers and brokers, Boston, 1894 to 1895; chief financial department Stone & Webster, electrical engineers, 1897 to 1902; partner J. M. Forbes & Co., bankers, Boston, since 1899. Member Philippine Commission and secretary of commerce and police in Government of Philippine Islands 1904 to 1908; vice governor of Philippine Islands July 1, 1908, to November 10, 1909; governor general since November 11, 1909. Clubs: Union, Tavern, St. Botolph (Boston), University (New York), University Columbia (Manila), Home, Boston. Address: Manila, P. I.

From his beginning as a clerk he went forward until he finally entered the public service, to which so many young college graduates of recent years have been attracted, and he went to the Philippine Islands not as governor general, but first in a subordinate position, and finally attracted the attention of President Taft, who himself had been the governor general, and who made Forbes governor general of the Philippines.

There has been opened up to-day the question of Philippine independence. I say, my position on that proposition is quite as sound and consistent with the Democratic platform, which I shall read, as that of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] or any other gentleman in this House. There can be no difference among us who are Democrats with respect to our position, and I do not believe there is much difference, Mr. Chairman, between those who are Democrats and those who are Republicans in regard to the matter. It is not a partisan proposition, but a proposition that involves the patriotism, the honor, and the intelligence of American citizens quite as much as it involves the right of the Filipino citizens across the seas to have that self-government which was the earliest cause of conflict of the United States in the days when we were but colonies. I read from the last national Democratic platform:

We reaffirm the position thrice announced by the Democracy in national convention assembled against a policy of imperialism and colonial exploitation in the Philippines and elsewhere. We condemn the experiment in imperialism as an inexcusable blunder, which has involved us in enormous expense, brought us weakness instead of strength, and laid our Nation open to the charge of abandonment of the fundamental doctrine of self-government. We favor an immediate declaration of the Nation's purpose to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as soon as a stable government can be established, such independence to be guaranteed by us until the neutralization of the islands can be secured by treaty with other powers. In recognizing the independence of the Philippines our Government should retain such land as may be necessary for coaling stations and naval bases.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, there are some who believe sincerely in the Jones bill, so called, and most of us who are members of the committee now charged with the responsibility of considering this matter are wondering whether we are wise in committing the party or the country to that particular proposition. I am frank to say I have never been in the Philippines, just as most Members of this Congress have never been there. All I am able to know about conditions is what I am able to get together and read from reports made by those who have been there. I have recently been charmed, and I believe instructed, by a book on the American Occupation of the Philippines, by one James H. Blount, who was a judge in the Philippines during his service there, just as he was a soldier, an officer in the Army, prior to his service on the bench.

I want to make public expression of my appreciation of that work, and I want to say I believe that it is a work that should be read carefully and closely by every man in the United States Congress who will be called upon to determine this question of the adoption or rejection of the Jones bill for Philippine independence. You, sir, are familiar with that book of Judge Blount, and you know that one of the great reasons that he advances there for getting out of the Philippine Islands is the danger of invasion by Japan in the event of any trouble between Japan and the United States. He advances that possible invasion, and he advances the proximity of the two places as a strong reason for our getting out of the Philippines. But suppose we do get out of the Philippines and Japan wants to take the place. Who is there to keep her from taking away those islands unless we have first had an international agreement that shall certainly stand behind the neutralization of the islands?

I believe that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] has done well to stimulate the interest of my colleagues and of the American people in this matter of Philippine independence. I hope the full effect of his speech may be not to slander Cameron Forbes, not to defame President Taft and charge him with falsifying facts to the American people, because, sir, if your issue in the Jones bill is to be "Is Cameron Forbes a grafter?" I shall vote "no." If the issue is to be, "Has President Taft falsified the facts?" I shall vote "no." But if the issue is, "Shall Congress declare its intention to establish the independent sovereignty of the Philippine Islands with the right to self-government?" I shall vote "yes," and I believe the majority of my colleagues will do the same. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to proceed for one minute.

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield one minute, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for one minute.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I can not think that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY], who is my personal friend as well as my associate on the Committee on Insular Affairs, means to say to this House that I have charged President Taft, or that I have charged Gov. Forbes, with falsifying statements. I said that President Taft was reported to have stated that our expenses on account of our occupation of the Philippine Islands were practically nothing. I have undertaken to inform the House as to some of the expenditures of the United States on account of our military occupation of the islands, and I have asserted that President Taft's views and mine as to what was "practically nothing" were very far apart.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, let us not quibble about it.

Mr. JONES. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that my speech will show for itself. I shall not change one single word or syllable in it. I stand by every word in it, but I do not intend to be put in any false position. I have charged nobody with falsifying statements. I have criticized President Taft's New York speech, as I had the right to, but I have done so with absolute fairness. No man on this floor entertains a higher regard for President Taft than I do, and I would be the very last man to charge him with wrongdoing. I know him to be incapable of it. No word I have spoken can possibly be distorted into a reflection upon the integrity of President Taft.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I will yield if I am accorded the time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield half a minute to the gentleman.

Mr. MURRAY. I want to ask the gentleman if he did not insist that President Taft had fixed $3,000,000 as the figure of cost of our occupancy of the Philippine Islands, and then proceeded to demonstrate that it cost not $3,000,000, but $300,000,000.

Mr. JONES. No; I said nothing of the kind. The gentleman has utterly misunderstood what I did say. The gentleman must know that the cost of civil government in the islands is one thing, and the cost of our military occupation another and entirely different thing. The Filipinos pay the entire cost of their civil government, whilst, of course, the United States pays the cost of our military. I said that President Taft said that the United States had contributed only $3,000,000 toward the civil administration of the affairs in the islands, and that that $3,000,000 had been given to keep the Filipinos from starving. I said that this was absolutely true, but I added that the commission had used part of that sacred fund on the Benguet Road. This is a wholly different statement from that which the gentleman would attribute to me. It was our military expenditures that President Taft said amounted to practically nothing. I have shown that they amount to many millions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands [Mr. QUEZON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from the Philippine Islands is recognized for five minutes.

[Mr. QUEZON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, on last Friday the ex-Speaker of this House, the Representative from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], in the course of a debate in regard to the alleged filibuster, gave expression to some views in regard to the Lincoln memorial highway. In the course of those remarks he said:

> Speaking respectfully, to my mind, it is a prostitution of that great man's name when you speak of using it as an argument for the promotion and construction of good roads.

Mr. Chairman, that, of course, is a question of opinion. Lincoln's name has been used for many purposes since he occupied the highest station in our Nation, and his fame to-day is greater and broader and more universal than ever before in our history. My only answer to that is to ask the Clerk to read a brief paragraph from the hearings before the Committee on the Library, containing the statement of Gen. Thomas S. Hopkins, chairman of the Lincoln memorial committee of the Grand Army of the Republic.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The Grand Army of the Republic some years ago indorsed the Lincoln highway. They voted upon it in national encampment, and the vote in favor of it was unanimous. From year to year they have continued the committee and I have been its chairman. Gen. Black, chairman of the Civil Service Commission, who is here to-day and who will speak, is also a member of that committee, and we come authorized to speak for that organization, to say to you gentlemen that the Grand Army of the Republic desires the Lincoln highway as a memorial to Mr. Lincoln. And I say to you also that we think that their preference, their wishes in the matter, while they should not be controlling with this committee, should receive your very careful consideration, because they helped in a small way to make Mr. Lincoln's name and fame. They stood behind him in those dark days, and many of them gave their lives for the cause, and the tie between Mr. Lincoln and his soldiers was very, very close.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is probable that the subject of the Lincoln Memorial will be brought up on Calendar Wednesday, to-morrow, and at that time the first free opportunity in general debate on the subject will be had. That is the proper time and place to discuss the merits of the proposition as to whether the highway or the Greek temple is the proper form of memorial.

The committee in charge of the bill have offered the opposition time to discuss that, and I have no doubt that the time promised will be given, and we shall utilize it for that purpose.

At this time I wish to draw the attention of the gentleman from Illinois and of this House to what I regard as a more important matter, which must enter into the views of this House in regard to the propaganda which has been carried on for the Greek temple. For that purpose I send to the Clerk's desk a clipping from the Philadelphia Public Ledger of January 23, 1913, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ASK AID FOR LINCOLN STATUE—MEMBERS OF ART ASSOCIATION REQUEST CONGRESSMEN TO VOTE FOR MEMORIAL.

A communication has been sent to every Congressman from Pennsylvania by the Fairmount Park Art Association, urging each to vote for the bill which provides for an appropriation to erect a Lincoln Memorial statue on the Mall in Washington. The letter reads as follows:

"DEAR SIR: Please do everything you can for the honor of Pennsylvania and the memory of Lincoln to secure the approval of the bill making an appropriation for the proposed Lincoln Memorial to be erected on the Mall in Washington, which is likely to come up this week in charge of the Hon. J. L. SLAYDEN, of Texas.

"If the grafters and automobile magnates who are trying to defeat this bill, in the interest of an automobile concourse to Gettysburg, accomplish their purpose, it will be a lasting disgrace against which the intellectual interests of the country are a unit in protesting.

"I am sending this letter by instruction of the board of trustees of the Fairmount Park Art Association.

"Yours, very respectfully,

"LESLIE W. MILLER, Secretary."

Mr. Chairman, that is not a question of opinion. If the allegation comes from any responsible source, from anyone who knows of any grafter behind the proposition for the memorial to Lincoln, it is the duty of that responsible organization to bring that evidence to the attention of Congress. For there has been altogether too much of this cheap, reckless, irresponsible criticism of the people's representatives in Congress. [Applause.] If any man knows of any graft or any lobby, it is his duty to bring these facts to the attention of the American Congress. I trust that the organization will call that officer to account, or make him make good the statement which he has made, for these are not questions of opinion but are matters of fact.

To show the character of the indorsement which has come for the Lincoln highway, I send to the Clerk's desk a letter from the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of San Antonio, Tex., which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AND BUSINESS MEN'S CLUB,
San Antonio, Tex., January 21, 1913.

Hon. WILLIAM P. BORLAND, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have yours of the 16th inclosing Library Committee's report on the Greek temple proposition, for which accept thanks.

I appreciate your sending me this report very much, and I immediately got busy and distributed these reports among our influential good-roads enthusiasts and in a few hours gathered them up and redistributed them, and, in addition to that, I had one of our daily papers print the report, and also print a statement from myself and others who had picked this report all to pieces and explained to the people the ridiculous part of it. Almost every organization of any kind whatsoever in San Antonio has wired Representative SLAYDEN insisting that he support the Washington to Gettysburg highway, and these telegrams have been constantly going to Mr. SLAYDEN for over two weeks, and more especially since it was referred back to his committee. The Washington Post clipping you sent me was published in one of our daily papers the day I received your clipping. Yesterday there was a telegram sent to Hon. JOHN N. GARNER, which reads as follows:

"We appreciate your efforts in behalf of the Lincoln memorial highway and pledge our assistance at any time we can be of help to this cause.

"J. W. WARREN,
"President Texas Good Roads Association.
"CHAS. GRAEBNER,
"President Chamber of Commerce.
"A. M. FISCHER,
"President Bexar County Highway League.
"CHAS. O. AUSTIN,
"President Real Estate Exchange.
"ATLEE B. AYRES,
"President Fiesta Division of C. C."

In addition to this quite a number of Mr. GARNER'S admirers are writing him personal letters. In addition, our highway division, the real estate exchange, Chamber of Commerce, Fiesta Association, and the San Antonio Automobile Club have asked me to express their gratitude to you for the noble work that you are doing for this highway. We all assure you that we appreciate it, and I hope that I will have the pleasure of meeting you on March 6 and 7 at the good-roads convention, which will be held in Washington.

Yours, very truly, D. E. COLP, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, it appears, therefore, that gentlemen in all lines of business and in every section of the country have some views to express upon the Lincoln highway. It does not remain for a secretary of an art association to blanket this country with letters—which I trust have been and which I am sure have been properly rebuked by the members of the Pennsylvania delegation—denouncing as grafters those who are behind any proposition for the expenditure of public money. It must be apparent to the membership of this House that there is a marked difference in tone on the part of those who advocate the Greek temple as against their opponents, as compared with that on the part of those who advocate the highway as against their opponents. The highway people seem to feel, and so far as I have known have always so expressed themselves, that the matter was for the fair, open, deliberate judgment of Congress. But the remarkable bitterness which has been developed on the side of those favoring the Greek temple is very difficult of analysis. It is difficult to escape the conviction that these scurrilous letters are inspired by some parasite of the Fine Arts Commission. I had my attention recently called to the fact that there was a vigilance committee in the District of Columbia to see that Congress did not exercise any independent judgment in this matter. I also had my attention called to the fact that there is pending before this House at this time Senate bill 2366, which has passed the Senate, for the purpose of appropriating $2,300,000 to remove the Botanic Garden into the bed of Rock Creek Park. Two million dollars for a Lincoln memorial and $2,300,000 to remove the Botanic Garden into the bed of Rock Creek Park make $4,300,000 which will have to pass through the banks of this city into the hands of the property owners and contractors of the District of Columbia. It is the solemn duty of Congress, without regard to partisanship but on the sole ground of patriotism, to exercise an unbiased and unpartisan judgment upon the expenditure of public money in the District of Columbia. We are charged with that responsibility and we can not escape it. We can not relegate it to any self-constituted vigilance committee of the District of Columbia that does not represent the rank and file of the small property owners of the District. I trust when this matter comes up to-morrow every man in the House will be prepared to exercise an independent judgment upon it, regardless of partisanship, regardless of the wishes of the vigilance committee. We must carefully consider that this will open the doors to endless expenditures of public money in the District of Columbia. It is but the beginning of a series of appropriations to buy up more or less unsalable property and increase the value of the remaining property in the District of Columbia.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Kentucky to yield me five minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state for the benefit of the committee that no limit has as yet been put upon debate, and it is my purpose to make a statement respecting the bill itself and to start the reading before 5 o'clock. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I have only a few words to say in reply to the statement just made by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] that the Grand Army of the Republic wants a highway built to Gettysburg as a memorial to Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. I refer to a record, not my own statement of the matter.

Mr. COOPER. Of course, if the gentleman does not indorse it, then it is nothing but the individual utterance of the source from which it came. The gentleman gave it to the House, and gave the House to understand that the Grand Army does want the road. I understand that the gentleman himself said at the meeting before the committee that the Grand Army favored it.

Mr. BORLAND. I said so and referred to the record of that fact.

Mr. COOPER. Yes. Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the committee, I will read a letter from a very distinguished member of the Grand Army of the Republic, a man who was its commander at one time and is now assistant adjutant general of the Grand Army of the Republic, Col. J. A. Watrous, of Milwaukee, a gallant soldier who was in the Battle of Gettysburg.

HEADQUARTERS GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
OFFICE OF ASSISTANT ADJUTANT GENERAL,
Milwaukee, Wis., December 28, 1912.

Hon. H. A. COOPER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. COOPER: It is true that two or three national encampments, after most of the representatives were absent from the hall and the few present were weary, favored the Gettysburg proposition, but at Los Angeles, in national encampment last September, when nearly all of the 700 representatives were present, a report strongly favoring the memorial in Washington was adopted without a dissenting vote, followed by prolonged and hearty applause. Not a word was said in favor of the Gettysburg highway. Hence the friends of the memorial in Washington can declare that the 200,000 who answered Lincoln's call and loved him, still living and members of the Grand Army, through their representatives in national encampment, are against the highway and in favor of the memorial in Washington. There has been no encampment since last September; hence there has been no reversal of the decision.

I am exceedingly glad that you are in favor of the memorial in Washington.

With all good wishes and a happy new year, I remain,
Yours, very sincerely,
J. A. WATROUS.

Here is a letter which I received from him yesterday from Madison, Wis.:

HEADQUARTERS GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
DEPARTMENT OF WISCONSIN,
Madison, Wis., January 25, 1913.

Hon. HENRY A. COOPER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. COOPER: Since writing you yesterday three past department commanders of Wisconsin, men who have been at the head of anywhere from ten to fifteen thousand Grand Army men, have asked me to include them in an appeal to Congress in behalf of the Lincoln memorial for Washington, and they took particular pains to say that they had not heard a single soldier in the State or elsewhere say a word in favor of the highway as a memorial, but nearly all of them, with whom they had conversed on the subject, thought it a most inappropriate thing to build an extensive highway which would be used chiefly by those owning automobiles and that the road would be lined with the kind of institutions that would be a disgrace to Lincoln instead of an honor.

In addition to that, Past Commander in Chief Weissert, one of the most popular men who ever headed the quarter of a million members of the Grand Army of the Republic, said: "If I have time, I will write Mr. COOPER myself, but anyway you say to him for me that with all my heart I hope that Congress will shield the Nation from a Gettysburg highway as a Lincoln memorial," and then he went on and gave many reasons why it would not be an honor to the great war President to build that road and call it a Lincoln memorial. You know Col. Weissert. He speaks for the boys of the Grand Army and the ex-soldiers with as much emphasis as any other man who has ever had anything to do with that organization.

The department commanders to whom I allude are Capt. J. P. Rundle, one of Milwaukee's best citizens and an extensive business man; another is Frank A. Walsh, and another is S. H. Tallmadge. While three others that I can name have not spoken to me on the subject within a day or two, as these have done, they have expressed themselves with great emphasis in favor of the memorial in Washington. I refer to that splendid soldier, Col. Benjamin F. Bryant, who won his way from a private to a major in an Ohio regiment. Another is R. B. Lang, whom you know, of Racine. Still another is Col. Fred Copeland, of La Crosse. I could give you the names of a hundred men, many of whom you know personally or by reputation, who have vigorously expressed themselves in favor of the memorial at Washington.

In short, Mr. COOPER, I do not hesitate to give it as my opinion, and, as you know, I have had rare opportunity to learn the sentiments of the ex-soldier element, that there is not one in ten thousand anxious for anything but the memorial in Washington as between the two propositions. I only wish that some one in each department realized the importance of bringing evidence before Congress on the subject and had taken it upon himself to shower Congress with letters and telegrams begging that the Washington memorial be chosen. Had there been time I am sure that there would have been a perfect shower all along the line from every State where there is a department of the Grand Army.

I begin to feel that I ought to apologize to you for such frequent writing, but I know of no one who would be more apt to use to advantage such information as I have been able to send you.

With best and all good wishes I remain,
Very sincerely, yours,
J. A. WATROUS.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] if he can give me five minutes more, and that is the last request I shall make.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have only five minutes remaining, but I will yield that time to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. I was much interested, Mr. Chairman, in what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] said about the "Greek temple." I have received many letters denouncing the "Greek temple." Apparently only very few persons know anything about what really is proposed. The room in the memorial is to be higher than this Chamber. The building itself is to be higher by a number of feet than is this wing of the Capitol. The interior columns will be 7 feet and 5 inches in diameter, 25 feet in circumference, and 50 feet high. The building will be both majestic and very beautiful. I give it as my judgment, after having seen many of the important memorials in Europe and some in Asia, that nowhere will there be another so simple, beautiful, dignified, and effective.

On entering it one will see nothing in front of him in the majestic room, 60 feet in height, except at the opposite end a statue to Abraham Lincoln, not in "Greek garments," as somebody said yesterday, but clad as he was here in Washington in the days when he was saving the Republic of the United States. [Applause.] The place will be a sanctuary. Turning and looking between the columns he will read on the wall:

Four score and seven years ago our forefathers brought forth on this continent a nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal—and all of that wonderful address.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Did not he say that on the battle field of Gettysburg and not in a Greek temple?

Mr. COOPER. He said it at Gettysburg. But the visitor who goes into this noble memorial, sees the great statue, and reads those immortal words, will think as never before of their meaning and of the man who uttered them. That is the object of this memorial.

Riding over a fine highway might be pleasant to the man riding, but how immeasurably much more would he learn of Lincoln while standing in that place sacred to his memory and reading the immortal lesson he taught the world.

The gentleman from Missouri denounces the memorial because it is of Greek architecture. From this I am sure that had he been here when the House many years ago was considering the bill which became a law and resulted in the monument to George Washington, and somebody had said we are going to erect an obelisk 555 feet high, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] would have risen in his earnest way and said, "Mr. Speaker, was George Washington an Egyptian; are we to have an obelisk—an Egyptian obelisk—in honor of the great Father of his Country? God forbid!" [Applause.] "Are we to erect an obelisk to George Washington, and every time we look at it think of Rameses the Second, and Tethmosis the Second or Third—I do not remember the number—or Hatshepsut?" [Laughter.]

Some gentlemen say that we ought to build something practical—utilitarian—because Lincoln was a "practical man," and then they refer to his having been a railsplitter.

We do not seek to honor Abraham Lincoln because he split rails. Ten million men in this country can split rails, but where is there another man who could have done what Lincoln did in the wild storm that threatened to wreck the Republic? Where another man who could have written the Gettysburg address? It is to the spirit—the soul—of Lincoln that we wish to erect this memorial. This talk of a Greek temple is meaningless. How the gentleman must shudder whenever going along Fifteenth Street he looks up at the Treasury Building and sees those Greek columns. [Laughter.]

I suppose the gentleman is an admirer of American architecture. For example, the structure down on the Avenue, the Post Office Building, which Senator Hawley called a cross between a cathedral and a cotton factory. [Laughter.] Or, perhaps, he prefers another example of pure typical American architecture, the lofty, noble red shed in Judiciary Square, called the Pension Building. [Laughter.]

I shall vote for the memorial hall, because, on the banks of the Potomac, with only the lagoon between it and the monument to George Washington, it will be the most superbly effective memorial in the world. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from John E. Gilman, past commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a certain letter. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

CITY OF BOSTON
SOLDIERS' RELIEF DEPARTMENT,
Boston, January 2, 1913.

DEAR SIR: While commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, in 1910–11, I was greatly impressed with the unanimity of feeling among the veterans of the Civil War in favor of a memorial to our martyred President, Abraham Lincoln, to take the form of a Lincoln way, extending from Washington, where he labored, lived, and died for the perpetuity of our Republic, to Gettysburg, the greatest battle and the turning point of the war, where he, in November, 1863, delivered what is known as Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, the best known and most admired piece of literature of modern times. Could such a memorial be constructed, it would, I am sure, be pleasing to more people than any Greek temple that could ever be conceived.

In the name of my comrades and in my own behalf, I appeal to you to lend all your efforts and influence toward the construction of a Lincoln way.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. E. GILMAN,
Past Commander in Chief Grand Army of the Republic.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has been consumed.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], in charge of the bill, asks unanimous consent to proceed for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I now desire to make a brief statement touching the bill that the committee will be asked to consider in a little while.

The estimates submitted to the committee aggregated $7,009,834, and the committee has recommended appropriations amounting to $5,218,250, which is $1,182,000 more than the bill of last year and $1,791,584 less than the estimates submitted.

These items of appropriation may be roughly divided into three general classes, namely: Fortification of seacoast forts, including ammunition; supply of Field Artillery matériel, including ammunition; miscellaneous items related to the above, but not strictly forming parts thereof. The first classification can be subdivided into three items: (a) Items pertaining to new armament and installation, including reserve ammunition. These items embrace guns, gun carriages, emplacements, sites for defense, electrical installation, searchlights, sea walls, submarine-mine structures, fire-control instruments and structures, and ammunition; (b) items pertaining to maintenance, repair, and alterations of property embraced in subdivision a, except ammunition; and (c) items pertaining to seacoast target-practice ammunition, including appliances for same, and subdivisions a and b should also be segregated according as they relate to continental United States and the insular possessions.

In the present estimates there is asked, under the first general division for continental United States, subdivision a, new matériel, etc., $1,219,084, of which sum there is recommended in the accompanying bill $673,000; under subdivision b, maintenance, repair, etc., $1,069,000, of which amount the bill carries $833,000; and under subdivision c, target-practice ammunition, $425,000, all of which is recommended in the bill, making a total estimate of $2,713,084, of which the bill carries $1,931,000.

In the insular possessions, under subdivision a, there is asked for new matériel, ammunition, etc., $1,847,531, of which there is recommended in the bill $1,430,031, and under subdivision b, maintenance, repair, etc., $89,319, of which the sum of $72,319 is recommended, making total estimates of $1,936,850, of which $1,502,350 is recommended, making a grand total of estimates of $4,649,934 for both continental United States and the insular possessions under the first general division, of which there is recommended $3,433,350.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. GARRETT. How much of that is for the Philippine Islands?

Mr. SHERLEY. There will be expended in the Philippines some $700,000 for emplacement work, and then a part of the moneys for ammunition and for mine material, and so forth, that it is difficult, if not impossible, to segregate into a detailed statement. The bill carries all of the moneys necessary to complete the fortification of the Hawaiian Islands, and with the amounts provided in the bill the project as it relates to the Hawaiian Islands should be completed in its entirety.

In addition to these sums for the fortification of seacoast forts, including ammunition, there is carried under the second class considerable sums for Field Artillery material, including ammunition. This committee is doubtless aware of the fact that the Army appropriation bill carries provision for mobile artillery material and ammunition for militia, whereas the fortification bill carries the appropriation for similar ammuniton and material for the Regular and Volunteer Army. It was represented before the committee this year, as it has been for several years past, that we were farther behind in having the requisite amount of material and ammunition for the mobile artillery than in any other particular, and it was urged upon the committee that we should be as liberal in the appropriations for these purposes as possible, and that if cuts were requisite they should not be made there. The Secretary of War appeared before the committee and submitted a detailed statement showing the relative order of importance of items contained in the Army and fortification bill.

Among those put at the very first in the fortification bill were the items relating to the mobile army. The committee in a general way have followed this recommendation made by those in charge of the Army. We have appropriated amounts that are larger than have been appropriated in recent years for matériel and ammunition, but we believe that the conditions presented by the hearings amply justify the position taken by the committee.

Under this second general classification there is asked, under subdivision a, new matériel, and so forth, including alteration of 8.2-inch batteries, $2,100,000, of which there is recommended $1,525,000, with an authorization of $300,000; under subdivision b, maintenance, repairs, and so forth, $45,000, all of which is given; under subdivision c, target-practice ammunition, $130,000, all of which is given; making total estimates of $2,275,000, of which the bill carries $1,700,000, with authorization of $300,000 as above.

Under the third general division there are asked the following items:

Current expenses, ordnance proving ground, Sandy Hook, N. J.	$56,200
Expenses of officers at the proving ground and compensation of draftsmen	18,700
Board of Ordnance and Fortification	10,000
Total	84,900

All of the estimates under the third general division are recommended.

One new project has been recommended by the committee, and that is the project that has from time to time been discussed and urged upon this floor but heretofore not allowed by Congress, namely, the one looking to the fortification of the mouth of the Chesapeake. When the original scheme for seacoast defense was adopted the report of the board, generally spoken of as the Endicott Board, recommended that there should be stationed at the mouth of the Chesapeake, to guard the entrance, monitors. That report was very greatly modified by what was known as the Taft Board report some years later, and in that report it was recommended that the mouth of the Chesapeake should be fortified by the building of an artificial island at the mouth and the creation of fortifications on both Cape Charles and Cape Henry.

Since then there has been a modification to the extent that they now believe that ample fortification can be had by the erection of defenses at Fort Henry, and that it will be unnecessary either to put additional fortifications at Cape Charles or to build an artificial island. This change has been brought about somewhat by virtue of the very great increase in the range of guns, and also by virtue of the increased draft of vessels, which in effect narrows the channel which war vessels of the first magnitude can use in coming through the Chesapeake.

I think it is only fair to say to this committee that this project for the fortification of the mouth of the Chesapeake was one about which the committee dealing with the matter had grave doubt. They studied it with considerable care and made a personal examination of the ground that was proposed to be purchased to be used for this fortification. The total project will cost, first and last, something between three and one-half and four millions of dollars. The cost of the land, which should be somewhere between $100,000 and $150,000, may be $125,000 or $130,000, is therefore a minor element in considering the project as a whole; and the committee, while anxious that nothing should be expended for the land beyond its true value, and believing that nothing will be so expended, yet realize that the determination of this policy should not rest upon the value of the land needed. The reason that finally actuated the committee in recommending the undertaking of this project was that we found a complete unanimity on the part of all Army and Navy officers touching the very great strategic importance of the lower Chesapeake, and the great desirability of fortifying it; and when it is realized, if their position is correct, that it is the key to great cities like Baltimore and Washington, that it involves the use by the Navy of a safe rendezvous in time of war, and also that it involves in a measure the security of the great naval station at Norfolk, I think that all will agree that Members should have very strong reasons for feeling that it should not be done to warrant them in putting their lay judgment against that of men who are trained to the study of these problems.

In this connection it may not be amiss to say on behalf of myself as chairman of the subcommittee on fortifications that I have recognized that there has always been and always will be a conflict of thought between the military man and the civilian. Any man who is deserving of being designated as a capable Army or Navy officer will be zealous, aye, overzealous, in his desire to have his country ready to meet any emergency that may arise; whereas the civilian will properly and necessarily discount, in a large measure, the view presented by the military experts. If we are to have an immediate war we are not going near fast enough. If we are not to have a war for 50 or 100 years, we are probably going too fast in our provision.

It seemed to me that the only position that could be taken was one that represented a compromise between these two necessarily hostile and conflicting views, and that without being frightened into undue expenditures we should yet have a proper realization of what war might mean to the country if it came, and should make proper safeguard for such an event happening.

No one who has read the history, not only of America but the history of any other great power, but must realize the tremendous loss of life and money that have come to nations because of their lack of preparation; certainly the history of America is replete with instances of that kind. I, for one, charged with the responsibility of presenting this bill to this committee, am not willing that we should lull ourselves into what I believe a false security as to the improbability of any war, and therefore not make proper provision.

As to just where the line shall be drawn, you will find as many opinions as there are men, but I submit to this committee that this bill here to-day presented is one drawn along conservative lines and does not undertake to push us too rapidly into expenditures for defenses, but does show a proper appreciation of what an inadequate defense might mean to the country in case war should come. In my judgment, the purpose of seacoast defense is to make absolutely free to seek the enemy the Navy of America. If a place is well fortified, in all human probability it will never be taken from the sea. Certainly to well fortify a place is to make it improbable that its capture will ever be undertaken from the sea except under extreme circumstances.

The proper fortification of our coast and our dependencies will insure to the Navy freedom of action to seek out the enemy and strike it, and that, to my judgment, is the best possible defense. Therefore it was, that weighing all these matters, having statements made by men who ought to know, who were trained to know, that fortification at the mouth of the Chesapeake would, in connection with mine defense and patrol of small craft, properly safeguard that very strategic point, that it would give a safe rendezvous to our Navy and protect the commerce that plies up and down the Chesapeake, the committee felt that it was no longer warranted in refusing to recommend the appropriation.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman inform the committee, or give it some information, as to the character and type of fortification it proposes to put there?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; it is proposed to place there certain batteries of big guns and mortars. In the original project it said 12-inch guns, but my judgment is that they should be 16-inch guns. I have not here the exact proposed plan of fortification, but I can give it to the gentleman later. I dislike to trust my memory as to just what it consists of.

Mr. HELM. It would be quite interesting to the committee. Some of us are not familiar with the project and such line of work, but we would like to know just what is going to be done.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will endeavor to give the gentleman and the committee full information. The hearings, both this year and formerly, show in detail, but I am unable for the moment to turn to it, but I will inform my colleague.

Mr. HELM. Speaking for myself, I am perfectly satisfied to have the gentleman summarize it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think four 16-inch guns and eight mortars and carriages; but I am unable to carry in my mind all the details of these various fortifications. I will see that the RECORD contains a correct statement of it, and when the item is reached I will endeavor to give the gentleman the detailed information.

Mr. HELM. What I am seeking to ascertain is how the fortification of this particular place differs, if at all, from other fortified points on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts? What difference is there to be in the fortification of this particular cape?

Mr. SHERLEY. The fortification is on a cape.

Mr. HELM. How is it different from other fortifications on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts?

Mr. SHERLEY. The only difference is that in this particular instance a little heavier armament will be used, because the field that it is desired to cover by these guns at this entrance is a larger field than that which exists at most of the fortified places.

Mr. HELM. What is the type of gun that is usually used at the fortified points on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts?

Mr. SHERLEY. That has been a matter of evolution, and the constant tendency is toward an increase in the size of the armament. The gentleman will appreciate that there is a necessary race going on between the armament of ships and of the land batteries who oppose them. As the armament of ships increases, as the protective armor is strengthened, it becomes more and more desirable to increase the range and the size of guns used in land defense, and the constant tendency has been toward using larger guns. Until very recently the largest gun that we were using was a 12-inch gun.

Mr. HELM. That is for coast defense.

Mr. SHERLEY. For coast defense. They now have 14-inch guns and in certain instances 16-inch. For instance, one of the guns that will be provided for Panama will be a 16-inch gun.

Mr. HELM. I am talking about our Atlantic and Pacific fortifications.

Mr. SHERLEY. In this particular instance, at the entrance to the Chesapeake Bay, I think 16-inch guns will be used.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I should like to have five minutes more.

Mr. HELM. Are these to be disappearing guns?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. HELM. All of them?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Are all the guns that are used in the coast defense disappearing guns?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Does any other country use the type of coast-defense gun that our Government is using?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no doubt that they use disappearing guns. As to whether they are the exact counterpart of ours I do not know, but I am inclined to think they are not.

Mr. HELM. These disappearing guns are concealed behind an embankment, are they not?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Would it be proper to denominate them as masked batteries?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gun rises over a rampart and is fired, and the recoil carries it below, causes it to disappear from an outside view.

Mr. HELM. In case a shell was dropped over behind this embankment or protection or rampart, and should explode in proximity to these guns, what probable effect would the débris thrown up have upon the machinery for raising and lowering these guns?

Mr. SHERLEY. I should say if it was a big enough shell and exploded close enough, it would put the gun out of commission.

Mr. JAMES. It would cause it to disappear.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; it would cause it to disappear as a usable gun.

Mr. HELM. Is there any world power Government that uses this method of coast defense?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; and in further answer to the gentleman I will say to him that I do not believe any successful attack can be made upon the efficiency of our seacoast defense. I believe it is as efficient, and probably more efficient, than that of any other nation.

Mr. HELM. I expect that there is no doubt the gentleman is entitled to that conclusion, and I would not put my judgment up against his. I was trying to get some information. Does any other country operate its seacoast defenses behind ramparts or protection such as our coast defense is operated behind?

Mr. SHERLEY. Without being able to state with accuracy, I have no doubt whatever that they do.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman has never made any investigation of that?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have not. I have never undertaken to assume that my judgment touching the technical side of the coast defenses was comparable to that of the officers of the Army. I believe in the efficiency, as well as the patriotism, of the Army officers who have planned our defenses. If I were to complain of their action, it would be not that they underdefend, but that they sometimes in their zeal overdefend and fortify, and I believe that our work is modern, up to date, and I know from having personally witnessed it, that the accuracy of fire of our men is surpassingly good.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman such time as he may desire.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want only three minutes.

Mr. GOOD. I yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. We are to have a caucus, and I desire to have the committee rise at 5 o'clock. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT. I see the bill carries for fortifications in the Philippine Islands $700,000. I will ask the gentleman where that is to be expended. Of course I can ask that question when the item is read.

Mr. SHERLEY. I can give them to the gentleman in detail. Most of that particular money is to be used on the island of El Fraile, in Manila Bay. It is a small island, about the size of a battleship, the top of which is being cut off, and it is being protected by heavy masonry and armor, and is to have an armament consisting of 14-inch rifles and 6-inch rifles. The work on that has now proceeded to a point where the masonry work is rising considerably above low water, so as to enable work to be carried on even during the typhoon season, and therefore there will shortly be completed the emplacements for the guns that are to be put there; hence the $700,000 was asked.

Mr. GARRETT. That is not a new project?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is no new project being undertaken at this time.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman know whether that is included in the territory that the bill which has been reported by the Insular Affairs Committee retains?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know, but I can say to the gentleman that the defenses of Manila consist of fortifications at Fort Mills, Fort Frank, Fort Drum, and Fort Hughes, these fortifications being on Corregidor, Caballo, El Fraile, and Carabao Islands. The project contemplates the making of Corregidor the Gibraltar of the East, and when the fortifications are completed they ought to be able to withstand indefinitely an attack from any foreign power. The idea has been to make them sufficiently formidable to permit Corregidor to be the place of the last stand by the American troops in the event of a serious and disastrous war in that territory. In Subig Bay the fortifications are of a minor nature and have been entirely completed for some time past.

Mr. GARRETT. Of course the fortification of the city of Manila is the principal necessity, because that is the heart of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. SHERLEY. This not only looks to protection of Manila city, but in the event of the capture of the city of Manila and the destruction of our fleet in those waters the defenses are made sufficiently strong to enable the American troops there to hold out indefinitely against an enemy.

Before concluding this statement of the bill and its scope I simply desire to call attention to the provisions touching powder, its purchase, and manufacture. They are as follows:

The appropriations herein made for ammunition, when expended for manufacture of powder at the powder factory at the Picatinny Arsenal at Dover, N. J., shall be so expended only on the basis of and toward the operation of said powder factory to not less than one-half of the full capacity thereof during each calendar year.

No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be expended for powder, other than small-arms powder, at a price in excess of 53 cents a pound.

As I have in connection with the Army bill already discussed this question, it is unnecessary that I should now further deal with it. Under the five-minute debate I will be glad to give any additional information touching this or other items.

It is proper that I should call the committee's attention to a new provision in the bill requiring the preparation of plans, and so forth, by the department before the submission of estimates. The reason for this is obvious.

I believe the bill presented properly provides for the continuation and maintenance of our seacoast defense and those other matters within its purview relative to national defense. I hope it will receive the critical examination of this Committee of the Whole and that it may receive its approval.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 28186, the fortifications appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask to present a conference report on the immigration bill for printing in the RECORD, and desire to give notice that on next Thursday morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal, I will call it up.

The SPEAKER. The conference report and statement will be printed in the RECORD under the rule.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] what he said as to when he would call up this conference report?

Mr. BURNETT. On Thursday, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

THE MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a paper written by Miss Luella A. Owen, of St. Joseph, Mo., entitled "The Missouri River and its future importance to the nations of Europe." This paper was read at the Ninth Geographical Congress, at Geneva, July 31, 1908. To my mind the article contains a vast amount of very useful and important information on the subject of inland waterways, especially as applied to the Missouri River.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the article mentioned. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The article referred to is as follows:

THE MISSOURI RIVER AND ITS FUTURE IMPORTANCE TO THE NATIONS OF EUROPE.

(A paper read at the Ninth Geographical Congress at Geneva, July 31, 1908, by Luella A. Owen.)

On account of the enormous growth of industries and the rapid development of natural resources in the United States during the past 10 years, the question of transportation has assumed unexpected proportions and become a problem calling for immediate solution. The official report of the Interstate Commerce Commission shows that within the time mentioned the volume of railroad business has increased more than 110 per cent, while the increase in railroad mileage amounted to only 21 per cent. As a logical result, the roads have become totally inadequate to meet the requirements of commerce, and the stress must be relieved by supplementary facilities that only the inland waterways can afford. For the time being competition is not the chief factor in traffic discussions, although even under present conditions it remains, as usual, an important consideration that can not be overlooked or ignored. What the roads can not accomplish the rivers must, and the vast tonnage of both heavy and bulky freight will be transported not only at greatly reduced cost but also with an economy of time which will figure as a new element in competitive water service.

No expert is required to point out the fact that the heaviest loss and greatest inconvenience resulting from lack of adequate railway service is necessarily borne by the great interior valley lying between the Rocky Mountains and the Alleghenies and drained by the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers. This valley produces the main support of the Nation, as well as the major portion of its heavy export surplus, and the most richly productive area is that vast region drained by the Missouri and its tributaries.

The long disuse of this wonderful and unsurpassed system of natural waterways has left the present generation in comparative ignorance of its unmeasured value until a realization of the overwhelmed condition of the railroads forced a dawning knowledge of neglected possibilities running wild unheeded.

In considering a subject of such wide extent and broad influence it is necessary to take a purely geographical view on which a clear conception of existing facts and future promise may be based. This includes a more extended range in latitude, longitude, and altitude than even the average inhabitant of the region is accustomed to take note of. The extremes of latitude are from those points on the Canadian line where Milk River crosses and recrosses to that where the waters pour into the Gulf of Mexico a total of 20 degrees. The longitude traversed by the waters of that most westerly tributary from their source to the sea is 24 degrees, while the variation in altitude is from sea level to perpetual snow, which on Longs Peak in Colorado is 14,000 feet, or 4,300 meters.

As a commercially navigable stream the Missouri is not equaled by any inland waterway in the world; and the force of its strong current can be converted into electrical energy for light and power not only in steep mountain passes and at the Great Falls, but might also be so utilized so far downstream as the cities of St. Joseph in Missouri and Atchison in Kansas, at which points the average rate of flow is about 7 miles per hour, the variations ranging from 6 at extreme low stage to 10 at the highest flood. The channel depth here at ordinary stage, between high and low, is about 30 feet. (This is the depth at the St. Joseph bridge, where it is 20 feet at low water, and on July 7, 1908, was 40 feet—by careful measurement taken by an experienced bridge employee.) The average fall between Omaha and these points is a little more than 1 foot per mile, diminishing to less than a foot at Kansas City. Below that the flow is from 3 to 4 miles, according to stage.

For domestic purposes the water supply is unlimited and pure, for, although far famed for the large amount of sediment held in suspension and transported to the Gulf, this is easily eliminated in settling basins provided for the purpose, and the water which flows off is absolutely pure under a powerful microscope. The supposition that the Missouri received its name from the quantity of solid matter carried is a mistake. The name is that of a once powerful tribe of Indians who welcomed the white adventurers to their lands on both sides of the stream where it flows through the present State, and who pronounced it Miz-zoo-rah or Miz-zoo-ri. The pronunciation with the soft s sound is pure Yankee and incorrect.

China alone possesses a river of approximate extent and similar in character, appearance, and commercial value, the Yang-tze-Kiang, whose yellow waters carry the vast interior traffic of a densely peopled region of about the same area, and give color and name to the Yellow Sea. The loess color is also seen in the lower Rhine, although this stream presents no reminder of the two other great turbulent streams beyond the known fact that the loess deposits on the banks of each have yielded evidence that human beings inhabited the regions before the close of the glacial period, and witnessed the causes and effects of a peculiarly interesting geological epoch.

The true headwaters of the Missouri River were not known until the summer of 1896, when a Government exploring party, sent into the mountains of Montana for the purpose of that discovery, completed the work undertaken a year before. The region was surveyed and mapped by these explorers, and in the same year the American Geographical Society published a short account of The Utmost Waters of the Missouri River, by Mr. J. V. Brower, who was chief of the party.

A portion of his description is as follows:

"At the crest of the Rocky Mountains on the southern border of the State of Montana, where the longest branch of the Missouri River takes its rise, the locality is essentially volcanic in its nature, but the eruptive forces have long since ceased to exist there, leaving crater walls and a serrated crest.

"The reconnaissance, which resulted in placing stone monuments on the State line, was principally conducted on snow-capped peaks, where several hundred snowslides had occurred recently, and during the latter part of June of the present year we encountered snow often 20 and 30 feet deep.

"The ascent of Burbside Mountain was accomplished, beyond which we were unable to pass with horses, on account of the tremendous drifts of snow.

"From every snow bank along the course of our exploration—and there were thousands of them—a little streamlet proceeded downward, under the rays of the summer's sun, to the lowest depressions of Culvers Canyon, where, uniting, the consequences incident to the birth of a plunging mountain stream were witnessed on every hand."

He also says:

"The channel distances have been very carefully considered, and all authorities available consulted, with the result that the longest continuous unbroken current of running water in the world, taking its rise near the crest of the Rocky Mountains in the upper portion of Culvers Canyon, State of Montana, thence flowing westwardly and northwardly through valleys that formerly constituted glacial lake beds, the stream, variously designated as Red Rock River, Beaver Head River, and the Jefferson Fork, passes the mouths of the Madison and Gallatin Rivers, and flows into the Mississippi above the city of St. Louis."

His carefully calculated total distance from the source under snow banks at the upper end of Culvers Canyon at an altitude of 8,000 feet above the sea, to the southwest pass at the Delta of the Mississippi, along the thread of the channel, is 4,221 miles. The distance from the same source to the junction of the Missouri and Mississippi is 2,945 miles. The total channel distance from the most extreme source of the Mississippi to the same point at the Gulf of Mexico is 2,553 miles, which is 1,668 miles less than the total main channel of the Missouri to the Gulf, and 392 miles less than the Missouri from its source to their junction.

The volcanic craters among the clouds here described, where the Missouri takes its rise, are only 20 miles, in an air line, from the western boundary of Yellowstone Park, while but 12 miles further eastward the magnificent activities displayed in the geyser basins may indicate that volcanic forces in the vicinity are merely dormant. Where flames appear to leap and flicker in the steaming waters of the Firehole Basin we find the extreme source of the Madison River, another of the beginnings of the Missouri, while the flow of the Gallatin commences with a combination of waters from hot springs and snow banks in the northwest corner of the park. The Yellowstone, which is the largest tributary of the Missouri above the Mississippi junction, takes its meager beginning on Two-Ocean Pass, at an altitude of 7,950 feet, and gains such volume while still in the park that its low-water discharge at the northern boundary has been estimated at not less than 2,000 cubic feet per second, which is the exact volume estimated as necessary to be drawn from Lake Michigan to supply the contemplated 14-foot waterway to connect the Great Lakes with St. Louis and the Gulf. The altitude at that point is 5,360 feet above sea level, and is the lowest in the park.

The Yellowstone could be navigated advantageously, not only to this point, but also for a distance of some miles beyond, by small steamers of capacity fully equal to those in use by the Americans at Manila for the transportation of both passengers and freight up the Pasig River and across the Laguna de Bay. The Yellowstone was always considered navigable by large river steamers for a distance of 300 miles above the junction with the Missouri, but, unfortunately, it has been closed to navigation for all time by a great dam at Glendive, Mont., whose object is to turn the water into irrigating ditches for converting a vast stretch of semiarid grazing land into farms to attract a heavy population and induce more varied development in what is essentially a stock-raising country.

Milk River and a large number of other good streams of the smaller class, starting from the mountains of Montana and Wyoming and flowing into the Missouri, are of sufficient size to offer an important mileage of waterways prepared by nature to carry a heavy traffic so soon as the commercial possibilities of small, light-draft boats shall have come to be recognized in the broad interior West, where their usefulness has never yet been tested. Their value, indeed, could not easily be overestimated, even if the service should be wholly confined to the distribution of products of the coal and lignite mines and oil wells of that region; and yet, by this means vast quantities of ores from the mountains and grain from fields on the high plateaus could also be cheaply and promptly transported to home markets; or, if loaded on barges, might be well started toward the shipping port that would be arrived at without breaking bulk. Some conception of the volume of water carried by these streams may be acquired from the mere fact that the width of the Missouri, where it receives the Yellowstone, is 860 yards at the ordinary stage of summer flow, when the depth, too, is ample for navigation.

Similar conditions as to available small rivers and serious need of increased transportation facilities are found in both North and South Dakota, where the situation is obviously more grave than in States better provided with railway service. Their staple crop, wheat, never brings the price of an open market to the producers. They sell of necessity for the price offered by those who can control transportation and ship at pleasure, and who, therefore, reap the greater profit. With transportation on those small streams cooperating with service on the Missouri, sales as well as shipments would be made directly to European countries, which would have become an open market to all the States of the interior. While cost to consumers would be reduced, the producer's profit would increase.

The longest tributary of the Missouri and also the most peculiar of all American streams is the Platte, or Nebraska. Its two sources start from high peaks of the snowy range of the Rocky Mountains in northern and central Colorado, from whence they rush through cloud-bathed parks to leap down narrow gorges into magnificent canyons, and then, after pursuing devious courses to widely distant sandy plains, find their way to a meeting place in western Nebraska. Geological observations show that in the very recent past a shallow lake of considerable size existed here, fed by the uniting waters of the two streams poured in from the west and south and drained by the Great Platte. Numerous flat-topped elevations in the grass-grown lake bed bear witness that the placid surface was dotted with small islands. The scene is of special interest on account of suggesting the idea that the decrease in water supply was of sudden occurrence, it being an established fact throughout the region that if a lake becomes dry from gradually failing flow its bed is so filled with sediment that little, if any, depression remains.

This was the lake of "La Hontan's Limit" on his famous voyage up the Long River. The descriptions of his entire trip are so remarkably correct that every point mentioned, on both the outgoing journey and return, is easily recognized by those who are themselves familiar with the rivers traversed and their shores. The distinctive peculiarities of gradually changing scenes are given with a terse faithfulness quite impossible to one not an actual observer. The key to his misfortune of discredit is readily discovered in the simple fact that after the first few hours on the Wisconsin River he had no correct knowledge of locality. Indian hospitality to strangers was cordial and guidance through their territory and that of friendly nations freely given, but with some carefully concealed element of strategy designed to prevent a repetition of the journey without the assistance of native guides. The narrative of the Baron La Hontan clearly shows how the deception in his case was accomplished.

As is well known, Indians traveled with incredible speed in their long, narrow canoes, especially when going with the current. After resting and feasting in the country of the "Kikapous," the refreshed party, reenforced by 10 warriors, seized with enthusiasm the idea of extending the journey to the "Plantation of the Sun," so it is reasonable to suppose that the canoes moved swiftly. But the account states that, having crossed the portage, they "embarqu'd upon the River Oulsconsin" and "arrived in four days at the place where it empties itself into the River Mississippi, which is about half a league broad in that part. * * * It lies northeast and southwest, and its sides are adorn'd with meadows."

Now, this is a good description of the junction of the Mississippi with the Missouri, but where it receives the Wisconsin it is only one-third of that width, half a mile, and flows from a north-northwest direction through a narrow valley between high rocky bluffs. The distance from the portage is a little less than 200 miles.

As mention is made of the possibility of having passed unseen islands "which the darkness of the night hid from us as we came down," it is evident the party traveled by night as well as day, which makes four days an unreasonable time for the passage of those 200 miles. Many years later the English traveler, G. W. Featherstonhaugh, gave a description of his descent of the Wisconsin from the portage to the Mississippi in a birch-bark canoe which carried eight persons "commodiously," besides a ton and a half of provisions and baggage. The canoe was "carried by the current, independent of the paddles"; the party camped on shore at night and the Mississippi was entered at 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the third day.

By vigorous use of oars the time might have been reduced at least half, so it is plain that four days' continuous travel were ample for concluding a downstream journey so far as the Missouri junction, which was evidently done and the fact concealed from the French explorer by simply misnaming the river whose rapid currents he "stem'd" for 12 days before reaching the Long River. The Platte is readily identified without the necessity of allowances for the influence of time or changed inhabitants. The broad, placid stream, with but a narrow channel; the fertile valley on both sides, changing to hilly country with wooded shores, and further on to a desolation of limitless plains, followed by a dreary waste of sand—this is the progressive picture even to the present time. The river is remarkable for the absence of short curves in its entire course through the State of Nebraska, and in places the water spreads out in shallow sheets of great breadth almost on a level with the low banks, and in appearance is very like the Bitter Lakes as seen in passing through the Suez Canal. The "Great Island," which "afforded great plenty of hares," is Grand Island, and the hares were jack rabbits, which were abundant on the western plains and are not scarce even now, but never quite reached the lower Missouri. The wolves and water fowl, the prairie chickens or pinnated grouse (called pheasants), and the "wild beeves" were all to be found where stated, but the wild turkeys that were sought in vain are known to have first appeared on the Platte in the year 1809.

No reasonable doubt of the journey can be based on the season in which it was made, for although it is usual for the rivers of the region to be closed by ice during a portion of the winter months, there are exceptions to the rule in frequent mild seasons, in which that return might be undertaken on January 26 and successfully accomplished. The stream called the "River of the Missouris" was the Osage, and that called the "River of the Osages" was the beautiful Niangua, near the mouth of which a village was burned. A familiar knowledge of the entire region and of its recent past would convince the most skeptic that the Baron la Hontan's description is incontestable proof of his journey up the Missouri and Platte Rivers, and that the impossible map was the fruit of Indian cunning. In tardy justice his name should be restored to a place on the geographical roll of honor as the first white man to penetrate into the real heart of the American Continent.

The Platte could easily and at reasonable expense be converted into a commercial highway of first importance, navigable by river boats of any capacity. The character of the country through which it flows is such that the work of construction and maintenance would be somewhat similar to that of the Suez Canal, but with all the difficulties occasioned by shifting sand eliminated in eastern Nebraska. The natural supply of water is ample if it were not diverted to other uses, the annual flow of the North Fork alone being reckoned by the chief engineer of the Reclamation Service as "sufficient to cover 1,000,000 acres of land 1 foot in depth." An enormous dam, called the Pathfinder project, has been built in eastern Wyoming for the storage of these waters for irrigation. This dam forms a reservoir having a capacity of 43,560,000,000 cubic feet, which is more than ten times that of the famous Croton reservoir in New York. A storage basin on the South Fork above Denver is being built, to have a water surface when full of 2,000 acres. This is surpassed by one of the greatest dams in the world, which is nearly completed, on the Belle Fourche, in South Dakota, creating a reservoir 60 feet deep, with a water surface of about 9,000 acres when full.

Irrigation is also too popular in Kansas, where the small boat might be effective in the navigation of rivers generally regarded as too shallow for steamer traffic. Even the Kansas is not too large to prove its usefulness, although at Topeka the river has about the breadth and volume of the Seine where it flows through Paris, and the Arkansas might afford valuable transportation to the southern section, below the great dam at Garden City, if irrigation be not too lavish.

If only the surplus waters of excessive floods were to be stored in reservoirs, as was understood to be the purpose when they were being projected, their great and lasting value to the whole valley of the Missouri and its tributaries would be fully comprehended by all who have ever witnessed the havoc created by such floods. But if, on the other hand, these and others under construction and in contemplation shall be allowed to store and distribute an equal volume for irrigation in the more general seasons when no such floods occur, the result must of necessity damage the whole great system of inland water transportation west of the Mississippi. Therefore it can be plainly seen that unrestrained enthusiasm for bringing desert tracts and grazing lands under irrigation may produce results not anticipated, and most disastrous to those regions themselves, as it has been stated by a prominent railroad official that the products of the northern interior States have doubled in 10 years while their railroad facilities increased but one-eighth.

The area of country drained by and therefore commercially tributary to the Missouri River and its affluents above the Mississippi junction is equal to three times that of the German Empire, or to the combined areas of Italy, Switzerland, France, Great Britain, and the German Empire, a total of more than 600,000 square miles, and it is the most productive portion of the United States. Various crops predominate in different States and sections of States, from wheat in the most northern to cotton in the southern, the State of Missouri alone being able to excel in the whole range, although its northern limit is in the same latitude as Naples and its southern extreme nearly 1 degree farther south than the city of Tunis in Africa. Though less than half the size of the State of Montana, Missouri has an area greater by 2,572 square miles than that of England and Switzerland combined. Not being under narrow restrictions as to soil, climate, and rainfall, this one State grows two-thirds as much wheat as all the Dominion of Canada and one-tenth of the maize grown in the world in one year; it rivals California in the value of the fruit crop; surpasses all the States in zinc production and many of the Southern States in quantity as well as quality of cotton; all again in horses and mules, takes high rank in production of cattle and hogs, and ships 107,000,000 dozen of eggs in a season. These are only a few of the most abundant products of which there is a heavy surplus for export. Each State in the whole drainage system is in various ways a rich producer and a heavy shipper to the markets of Europe, and yet all the region under discussion could increase its output to an incredible extent to meet demand if there were adequate means of transportation.

In turn, the valley of the Missouri and its affluents is the consumer of an enormous quantity of European raw material and manufactured goods. The transportation of these imports and exports across the country by rail, or partly by rail and partly by the Lakes, is much more expensive than carriage by the Missouri River would be; and that without counting a great difference in port charges owing to negro labor in the South being cheaper than similar service at ports in the East, food in the South being a light expense and little clothing required.

With the advent of railroads in the West 50 years ago, transportation on the rivers was almost wholly abandoned and the tyranny of pilots ceased to trouble commerce. The Missouri is naturally a navigable stream, but is beset with dangers from shifting sand bars and stranded trees that require specially trained pilots and prohibit night travel. To meet the present stress immediate improvement is imperative, but consists simply in clearing the channel of these bars and snags and then maintaining it so, with the additional feature of navigation lights to perfect the security of continuous travel with increased speed. This work will be very inexpensive in comparison with the cost of building railroads having but a small fraction of the transportation capacity. The chief engineer in charge of river work at points below Sioux City has estimated that a congressional appropriation of $1,000,000 would place a dozen parties at work on different portions of the stream starting improvements that four or five millions in successive years would finish. The first year's work would put the river in good condition for navigation from the junction with the Mississippi to Fort Benton in Montana; and following that the channel would be widened and kept clear of obstructions and the banks protected from encroachments of the current.

A prominent railway authority and official of the Northern Pacific road has estimated the cost of additional track mileage and terminals of capacity to properly move the present freight of the country at $5,500,000,000, but states that this need can not be met. In discussing the situation he gives the average speed of a freight train as from 12 to 15 miles per hour, and the average distance traveled by each freight car in service as about 25 miles per day, saying "That is, the entire freight equipment of the country is employed to the fair limit of its capacity but two hours out of the twenty-four. On single-track lines freights must wait on sidings while passenger trains have right of way; cars stand for days or weeks in yards or at transfer points waiting their turn."

The same authority declares that a 15-foot channel from St. Louis to New Orleans would go further to relieve the entire Middle West and Southwest than any other work that could be undertaken, and that with such a depth of water a single powerful towboat would carry from 30 to 40 trainloads.

Others demonstrate the value of river service by the efficiency of the 9-foot channel of the Ohio, as shown by the official report, that one steamer sometimes tows as much as 60,000 tons of freight from Louisville to New Orleans on one trip. The horsepower of this steamer is 2,175, while that of locomotives to haul the same cargo on a road of average grade would be 24,000. The cost per ton per mile is said to be about one-eleventh of the average rail rate. The average cost of water transportation in the country in competition with rail is one-sixth of the cost by rail.

Freight transported down the Missouri River for shipment to foreign ports would have the time advantage of uninterrupted progress; and to the economy of water rates would be added that of no necessity of transfer anywhere between the starting point and shipping port, even if the start were made in the interior of Montana. And return cargoes of imports would be equally favored in distribution.

If the markets of Europe were thus opened to direct communication with the unlimited resources and heavy requirements of the Middle West and Northwest, the advantages would be mutual and of steady growth. The Missouri River is therefore as important to the nations of Europe as to the States it drains.

LINCOLN MEMORIAL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of making some remarks relative to the Lincoln Memorial in this city.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Lincoln Memorial. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a Lincoln memorial hall should be substituted for all other kinds of memorials proposed in the resolution and amendment; it should be similar to the Albert Memorial Hall erected by the English people in London as a monument to the Prince Consort in the last century. It is a vast amphitheater in the Italian renaissance style, destined for concerts, scientific congresses, and art assemblies, and other similar uses. The building was erected from 1867 to 1871, designed by Fowke & Scott, architects; it is oval in form and measures 270 by 240 feet and 810 feet in circumference, and comfortably accommodates 8,000 people. It cost £200,000—one-half contributed by the public treasury, the other one-half by citizens, associations, and private subscriptions. This hall is situated on the south edge of Hyde Park. The architects were guided by the principles upon which the Romans constructed their great amphitheaters, and have succeeded in the Albert Hall in raising a structure unsurpassed in its attraction and beautiful proportions, and at the same time of great practical utility.

A similar memorial hall and auditorium should be erected in Washington to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, and used for the same purposes as the Albert Memorial Hall is used in London. I have to-day introduced a resolution for that purpose, and desire to present it as a substitute for the other resolutions on this subject. It is as follows, viz:

House concurrent resolution 69.

Resolved by the House of Representative (the Senate concurring), That the plan, design, and location for a Lincoln memorial determined upon and recommended to Congress December 4, 1912, by the commission created by the act entitled "An act to provide a commission to secure plans and designs for a monument or memorial to the memory of Abraham Lincoln," approved February 9, 1911, be, and the same are hereby disapproved, and the said commission is hereby continued with directions to select a location in the city of Washington, D. C., and to secure plans and designs for the erection of a Lincoln national memorial hall and to make recommendation and report thereon to Congress at the session beginning the first Monday in December, 1913; said hall to be erected and dedicated to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and to be suitable for use as an auditorium for all such national and international public assemblies and uses as Congress may hereafter designate.

I also desire to insert as part of my remarks an editorial from the New York Tribune, of recent date, on this subject, and I fully concur in its conclusions. It is as follows:

[From the New York Tribune.]

A NATIONAL HALL.

The proposal to hold an inaugural reception in the rotunda of the Capitol, which is about as ill equipped for such a gathering as any large hall could be, calls renewed attention to the lack of adequate facilities in Washington for indoor state ceremonies on a large scale. There is no place where an inauguration address can be satisfactorily delivered in case of inclement weather, or where an international conference can be suitably conducted. When President McKinley died the state funeral was held in the Rotunda of the Capitol, but its size is inadequate, its lighting bad, and it is entirely unadapted to such ceremonies. The United States should have in Washington a structure for important meetings and ceremonies. It should be a building with all the dignity of a great Roman basilica or Gothic church, large enough to hold several thousand persons, impressive enough for the most solemn occasion. In addition to an auditorium it might well contain rooms where an international conference could be held and quarters where national guests could be suitably lodged. There an inauguration address could be delivered, a state reception given, a national hero's body lie in state, a public funeral be held. It might be for Washington what "the great hall of William Rufus" is to London or the Pantheon is to Paris.

The grounds in the rear of the Capitol, where the Grant Monument is being erected, would have furnished a suitable site for such a building, which, indeed, would be an appropriate monument to one of the Nation's great men. There are other available sites convenient to the Capitol, and there are other men whose memory the country holds in honor, any one of whom might be appropriately commemorated by a building at once grand and useful. Such a secular cathedral, which might be a hall of fame as well as a temple for the ceremonial functions of the Government, would serve a practical utilitarian purpose and be a stimulant of patriotic feeling.

EUROPEAN MUNICIPAL MARKET CONDITIONS.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the high cost of living and distribution and collection of food supplies, and to print a short article on the subject of terminal market conditions in European countries, prepared by Mrs. Elmer Black, a member of the advisory board of the New York Market Terminal Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit some remarks on the subject of high cost of living, and particularly to that problem incident to the same which involves the collection and distribution of food supplies whereby the producer and consumer may be brought into better economic relations with each other, and to that end and elucidative thereof I am incorporating under the leave granted me a brief but comprehensive and exceedingly interesting article by Mrs. Elmer Black, a member of the advisory board of the New York Terminal Market Commission, covering an extensive investigation into European municipal market conditions and management.

While this article was prepared with the primary purpose of facilitating the establishment of a much-needed terminal market in the city of New York, the information contained therein, obtained after much painstaking effort and visits to all the large municipal markets of Europe, ought to be more readily available to the producers of the country as well as to the municipalities which represent largely the consumers.

The article referred to is as follows:

Article by Mrs. Elmer Black, member of the advisory board of the New York terminal market commission, upon the subject of "European municipal market conditions and management."

FOREWORD.

In the belief that the establishment of a first-class terminal market system, worthy of twentieth-century requirements, is a matter of vital importance to every family in New York, I have spent considerable time during the past few months investigating markets on both sides of the Atlantic.

As a result I am more than ever conscious of the need for an enlightened public opinion to support the efforts of the terminal market commission to secure this benefit for our community. I am convinced that our fellow citizens will approve the requisite expenditure once they are roused to a realization of the inadequacy of our food-distributing centers.

In the hope that my investigations may aid in the accomplishment of this reform I have prepared these observations, comments, and comparisons.

It is true that the problem of the high cost of living is afflicting the old lands of Europe, the newer countries like New Zealand, as well as our own wide territories of the United States. The causes vary according to local conditions, but everywhere it is agreed that a potent force for the amelioration of the condition of the consumers is found in the establishment of efficient terminal markets under municipal control for all progressive cities. With wise administration, stringent inspection, and sound safeguards these municipal markets benefit both producers and consumers. They eliminate considerable intermediate expense, delay, and confusion. Last, but not least, they return a profit to the city treasury.

It is because our New York markets achieve none of these beneficent results that I issue this plea for the establishment of an adequate terminal market system. I appeal to all who have the welfare of their city at heart to add the force of their opinion to the accomplishment of this civic improvement.

UNITED STATES.

New York, with over 5,000,000 inhabitants, has no effective market system. The buildings are out of repair, there is little or no organization, and the superintendent has testified before the New York food investigation commission (Mar. 12, 1912) that on their administration last year there was a loss to the city treasury of $80,000. To that must be added due consideration of the inconvenience to the consumers, producers, and dealers and the extra cost of handling entailed by the lack of modern market methods. The city has almost quadrupled its population in a generation, but the markets remain about as they were. Many other cities in the United States not only testify to the value of municipal markets as a means for lowering prices to the consumer, but so guard their interests as to provide a very different balance sheet.

Boston has a profit on its markets of $60,000, Baltimore $50,000, New Orleans $79,000, Buffalo $44,000, Cleveland (Ohio) $27,507, Washington (D. C.) $7,000, Nashville (Tenn.) $8,200, Indianapolis $17,220, Rochester (N. Y.) $4,721, and St. Paul (Minn.) $4,085.

If the following facts concerning municipal markets are studied, also, it will be seen that no city in any way comparable to New York fails to make the municipal markets yield advantages both to the community and the city treasury.

THE BRITISH ISLES.

London naturally serves as a starting point for a tour of European investigation. The British capital has, indeed, features that render it comparable in a peculiar degree with New York. The population of both, including their outer ring of suburbs, is over 5,000,000. In each case there is access to the open sea by means of a noble waterway over which passes the commerce of the seven seas. Railroads supplement the water-borne cargoes with home-grown produce fresh from the farms for the use of urban kitchens.

London's markets do not afford the unbroken example of municipal control that they would if a new system were to be created at the present day. Precedent looms large in British administration, and even now there are only two ways of establishing a market—by parliamentary authority and royal charter. King Henry III covenanted by charter with the city of London not to grant permission to anyone else to set up a market within a radius of 7 miles of the Guildhall, and this privilege was subsequently confirmed by a charter granted by Edward III in 1326. But of late years the city corporation has waived its rights and allowed markets to be established in various districts wherever a real necessity has been shown to exist. In fact, the markets of London have grown with the city, keeping pace with its requirements.

There remains, however, the fact that certain corporation markets and Covent Garden markets serve as great wholesale terminals, connected more or less unofficially with the numerous local markets in the outlying districts.

Chief among the corporation markets is Smithfield, covering about 8 acres and costing altogether $1,940,000. There are to be found wholesale meat, poultry, and provision markets, with sections for the sale, wholesale and retail, of vegetables and fish. In the last 20 years the development of cold-storage processes has lowered the quantity of home-killed meat and remarkably increased the importation of refrigerated supplies. Last year the wholesale market disposed of 433,723 tons of meat, of which 77.2 per cent came from overseas.

Ten years ago the United States supplied 41 per cent of the Smithfield meat, but now these supplies have fallen off enormously, and the last report of the markets committee says: "The United States, in particular for domestic needs, is within measurable distance of becoming a competitor with England for the output of South America." South America and Australasia are indeed the chief producers to-day for the British market.

This has developed a great cold-storage business in London. All told, London can accommodate 3,032,000 carcasses of mutton, reckoning each carcass at 56 pounds. Over 41 per cent of England's imported meat passes through Smithfield, and railroad access is arranged to the heart of the market. The Great Northern Railway Co. has a lease from the corporation on 100,000 feet of basement works under the meat market, with hydraulic lifts to the level of the market hall and inclined roadways for vehicular traffic.

Most of the tenants at Smithfield are commission salesmen, who pay weekly rents for their shops and stalls at space rates, all the fittings being supplied. Last year these rents brought in $427,920. There is a toll of a farthing on every 21 pounds of meat sold, which, together with cold storage, weighing, and other charges, amounted in the same period to $241,635. The meat sales are entirely wholesale, except on Saturday afternoons, when there is a retail "people's market," where thousands of the very poor buy cheap joints.

The inspection is very strict, every precaution is taken to insure cleanliness, and breaches of the regulations are punished by fines or imprisonment. All condemned carcasses are sent to a patent Podewil destructor to be reduced by steam pressure and rolling to a powder, which is disposed of as an agricultural fertilizer.

On these central meat markets there is a profit of about $100,000.

The corporation also controls a great live-cattle market at Islington, covering 75 acres. Over $2,500,000 have been spent on this market and the modern slaughterhouses attached thereto. These slaughterhouses are not regarded as a remunerative concern, but are provided because they afford hygienic methods, and private slaughterhouses in London are decreasing rapidly. Last year 37,670 cattle, 101,646 sheep, 11,722 calves, and 34,981 swine were slaughtered there, the charges being 36 cents a head for cattle, 4 cents for sheep, 8 cents for calves, and 12 cents for hogs. Mainly on account of the extensions and improvements, this market is not being run at a profit at present, but its public utility is held to justify the outlay. Nor does the Deptford cattle market of 30 acres, maintained on the banks of the Thames to deal with live cattle imported from abroad, pay its way. But there has been a serious decline in imported stock in late years, especially from America. At this market extreme precautions are taken to prevent the entry of cattle disease that might spread infection to British flocks and herds. All animals landed there must be slaughtered within 10 days and submitted to rigid inspection. All hides and offal are immediately disinfected. Five hundred cattle can be unloaded from vessels at Deptford in 20 minutes. Last year 104,351 animals were killed, the meat being sent for sale to Smithfield and Whitechapel.

Billingsgate, the famous fish market of London, is also administered by the corporation. Its records cover over 600 years. It is hampered by narrow street approaches, but a very expeditious system of direct delivery of fish from the Thames side of the market building enables the licensed auctioneers to dispose of supplies very quickly. Steam carriers collect the fish from the fleets around the coast and deliver them packed in ice at Billingsgate every night. Billingsgate market has cost the city $1,600,000. Stand prices are high, but there is keen competition whenever a vacancy occurs. Last year the receipts amounted to $182,455. The auctioneers dealt with 194,477 tons of fish, of which 120,905 were water borne and 73,572 land borne. The city profited to the extent of over $40,000 on this fish trade.

On the wholesale and retail meat, fruit, vegetable, and fish market at Leadenhall there is also a profit of over $5,000.

On the entire municipal-market enterprises of the city there is a profit of $156,000. The markets are regarded with especial interest by the corporation, and the committee which regulates them is considered one of the most important in the whole administration of the city. In order to keep abreast of the times most of the profit is expended on improvements and extensions.

Covent Garden, London's great fruit, flower, and vegetable market, is owned by the Duke of Bedford, whose family have held it for hundreds of years. In the past century they have spent $730,000 on extensions and improvements. Of the present modern buildings the fruit hall cost $170,000 and the flower building $243,000. Formerly the producers were chiefly concerned in the market, holding their stands at a yearly rental. But with the expansion of London the growers have gradually given place to dealers and commission men, who pay 25 cents a day per square foot of space, and on the produce at a regular scale according to its nature. On flowers there is no toll, but each stand holder pays a fixed rental. Though this market has direct access neither to river nor railroad, it still retains its premier position among the wholesale markets of England. As the approaches are extremely narrow, most of the produce has to be carried on the heads of hundreds of porters from the wagons outside into the market buildings. As it is under private ownership, no figures are issued, but there is known to be a huge profit on the market. For outer London there are fruit and vegetable markets at Stratford in the east, Kew in the west, the Borough in the south, and two railroad markets in the north.

Birmingham, England's chief midland city, has owned its markets since 1824, administering them through a markets and fairs committee. Since 1908 the profits have been somewhat reduced, owing to outlay on improvements and extensions, but, although the city has expended $2,156,362 on the markets, the profits have paid off more than half of that indebtedness, besides relieving taxation in other directions.

Not far away is the small city of Kidderminster, that may be mentioned as affording a demonstration of provincial municipal enterprise under more restricted conditions. On its vegetable market it makes a profit of $1,000 and on its butter market a profit of $1,500. The population of the city is only 25,000. Another midland city, Wolverhampton, makes a profit of nearly $20,000.

Liverpool, the great northern port on the Mersey, has spent $1,242,534 on six municipal markets. The only market to lose money is the cattle market, which shows a deficit of $8,000. Liverpool has a cold-storage capacity for 2,176,000 carcasses. On the whole municipal market enterprise in this city of 700,000 people there is an average annual profit of $80,000.

Manchester serves not only its own area but surrounding industrial centers, with a total population of nearly 8,000,000. There are 12 markets and 4 slaughterhouses. Since 1868 the city has benefited by their administration to the extent of $3,250,000 profit.

Next to that of London, the fish market here is the largest in England. Its annual profit is well over $10,000, in addition to heavy extension payments in late years.

Dublin, the capital of what is often called "the distressful isle," makes a profit of $14,000 on the food market and $12,000 more on the cattle market, while Edinburgh, Scotland's chief city, makes about $15,000 a year on municipal markets.

Statistics are available of something like 150 other British towns and cities, ranging from a population of 5,000 upward, where there is the conviction born of experience that municipal markets pay not merely in profits but in convenience to the community, and they have a powerful influence in keeping prices down.

GERMANY.

Perhaps more than any other country in the world Germany places reliance on municipal markets, because of the peculiar pressure of the problem of the high cost of living in the cities of the fatherland. On several occasions during the last 12 months the butchers' stalls have been raided by women in protest against the 10 per cent increase in one year on the price of meat. And when to meet the clamor the Government reduced the hitherto prohibitive import duties on meat by one-half and the inland railroad charges by one-third it was on condition that the meat brought in should be for delivery to municipal markets or cooperative societies only. The result has been an immediate fall in retail prices ranging up to 50 per cent.

Berlin's 2,000,000 people since 1886 have had a splendid terminal market on the Alexanderplatz, consisting of two great adjoining halls, with direct access to the city railroad. One of these halls is entirely wholesale, while the other is partly wholesale and partly retail. Meat, fish, fruit, and vegetables are dealt with under the same roof by upward of 2,000 producers and dealers.

The whole market cost $7,250,000, of which $1,920,711 was for the main market and $4,852,862 was for the slaughterhouses, which are most elaborately equipped to insure sanitation and cleanliness. Great as the market is, the pressure of business has grown so much that a project is on foot to construct more accommodations at a cost of $15,000,000. The market is maintained by stand rentals and administrative charges and by a fund established for the improvement and extension of the system. On the entire enterprise, when all charges have been met and interest paid, there is a profit of over $135,000 a year.

A committee of 11, partly city councilors and partly selected representatives of the public, administer the markets, with 93 officials to insure the carrying out of their orders. The regulations are most elaborate, especially as regards the inspection of foods, which is conducted by a department having a staff of 600.

A healthy competition is created by the system of sales, which may be conducted by the producer himself or through an approved wholesale dealer or through one of the six municipal sales commissioners. These municipal sales commissioners have to give bonds on appointment and are not allowed to have any interest in the trade of the market beyond a small percentage on sales. Producers living at a distance can have their business carried through by them under conditions so well understood and respected as to insure confidence. Though the municipal sales commissioners handle less than a quarter of the sales, they nevertheless act as a check on the private dealers, especially as they issue a regular report on the average wholesale prices. Moreover, the purchasers benefit by these market arrangements, for if they buy from a regularly authorized dealer they can file a claim with the administration if the supplies delivered are faulty, and if their case is proved the account will be rectified.

About 50 carloads can be handled at once at the market, but when extended accommodations are provided it is intended to deal with 200 carloads simultaneously. On supplies thus delivered a railroad tax is collected from the receivers for maintaining rail connections, and this yields an annual profit of $11,000.

Of the stand holders, nine-tenths are monthly tenants, and the remainder pay by the day. The highest charge is 9.5 cents per square meter a day for meat stalls. The fish sold comes mainly from Geestemunde, at the mouth of the Weser, and is sold under the strictest conditions, only a small commission being allowed to be added by the dealers.

The slaughterhouses deal with 800 wagons daily, and for the use of the butchers and the market generally 2,000 square meters of distilled water are produced every day valued at 4 cents the square meter. Eight thousand pipes conduct the water to every part of the market. To insure cleanliness, bathrooms and rooms for drying clothes are established for the use of the butchers, who are charged 2½ cents a bath. In inspecting the carcasses the veterinaries take the most minute precautions. From every animal four samples are taken at different parts of the body, and each of these samples is submitted to tests for 20 minutes.

In an average year 14,000 carcasses are condemned and destroyed, as well as 400,000 diseased parts. Whenever possible the inspectors cut away diseased portions, and the remainder of the carcass, after being sterilized, is sent to the markets known as the Freibank, for sale to the very poor. This proportion is not so startling when it is considered that something like 2,000,000 animals are slaughtered every year, of which more than half are pigs. Until recently Germany used to export a large number of prime animals to the London market, but the demands of home consumers now prevent this and the export trade has practically ceased. In fact, Germany, in common with the rest of Europe, is now competing for the world's refrigerated supplies.

Storm doors and windbreaks are provided at the entrances to the markets and wagons are only allowed inside at certain hours and through specified doorways. Thus there is an absence of dust, and a carefully arranged series of windows insure ample ventilation. All dealers have to unpack their stock at least once every seven days for the destruction of unsound articles. All supplies of unripe fruit, horseflesh, and artificial butter have to carry labels disclosing their real nature. Attached to the market is a hospital with skilled attendance for cases of sickness or injury happening on the market premises.

As in most other centers, the establishment of the market led to the peddlers entering into outside competition. They bought their supplies wholesale inside and then offered them cheaply outside, free from stand rentals and other charges. This menace to the prosperity of the market grew so great that the peddlers' traffic in adjacent streets was prohibited and strictly limited elsewhere. This measure, in fact, is deemed essential in every city where municipal markets are conducted successfully.

Cologne completed a million dollar market in 1904 with a cold-storage plant and connections with the State and narrow-gauge railways. Nearly half the space is taken up by wholesale dealers in fruit and vegetables.

The chief fault of the market is the remoteness from the center of the town. At first it had a great success, but, on this account, it has not been entirely maintained. Encouraged by that initial prosperity, the city authorities bought a nearer site, but the subsequent decrease in the market's popularity has caused the postponement of extensions. Though the market does not pay the 5 per cent on capital that is required, the present administration, even with its drawbacks, does succeed in making a profit of about 3 per cent on the capital invested, last year's income amounting to $535,200.

Hamburg is peculiarly situated as to its market conditions. The market halls of Hamburg and Altona adjoin, but while the former is under the control of the Hamburg Senate, the latter is subject to the laws of the Prussian Government and administered by the Altona city authorities. Each has a large hall, with a considerable portion of the space used for auctions. The Senate of Hamburg appoints two auctioneers and Altona one; but, while the latter is a salaried official, the former are two Hamburg auctioneers approved by the Government for the special market business on undertaking not to trade on their own account. The trade of the chief market is in fish. With the Altona market, the Hamburg market, and the Geestemunde market, the sales in this section of Germany are the most important in the Fatherland for fresh sea fish and salted herrings. About a fourth comes in fishing cutters or steam trawlers direct alongside the market halls, while the remaining three-fourths come from Denmark by rail or by ships from England, Scotland, and Norway. Often there are three or four special fish trains from the north in a day, while 25 to 30 steamers bring the regular supply of imported fish.

The auctioneers derive their revenue from a 4 per cent charge on sales of the cargoes of German fishing vessels and 5 per cent on imported supplies. Out of this they pay half of 1 per cent to the Government on the German and 1 per cent on the foreign sales. No fees are charged to importers and dealers using the auction section of the fish market. Out of the percentage paid to the Government by the auctioneers is provided light and water, the cleansing of the halls and the carting away of refuse for destruction. Strict regulations govern the inspection of the fish, and to insure the destruction of those that have deteriorated they are sprinkled with petroleum immediately on detection.

Steam fishing boats using the market quays pay 48 cents for 24 hours' use, seagoing sailing cutters 24 cents, river sailing cutters 6 cents, and small boats 3 cents, in which charges the use of electric and other hoists is included.

From these markets almost the whole of Germany receives its sea-fish supplies, for the distribution of which most of the leading dealers have branch houses in the principal cities.

There are also two markets—one in Hamburg and one in Altona—for the sale of farm produce, mostly transported thither by boats. Besides these, there is a big auction for imported fruit, conducted by private firms. All these Hamburg markets are prosperous, and their utility to the community is universally acknowledged.

Frankfort's market system dates back to 1879, when the first hall was erected at a cost of $375,000. It has 548 stands on the main floor renting at $1.08 per 2 square meters a month, payable in advance, while there is space for 347 more in the galleries at 84 cents per 2 square meters a month. Near by is a second hall, built in 1883 at a cost of $143,750. A third hall followed in 1899 at a cost of $38,500, while in 1911 further extensions were determined on and there are fresh projects now under consideration. Besides these covered markets the city has a paved and fenced square that has been used since 1907 as an open market, where stands are rented at 5 cents a day.

Sixty per cent of the stands in the market halls are rented by the month and 40 per cent by the day. Tuesdays and Fridays are reserved for wholesale trading. A market commission rules the markets, and the police enforce their regulations, the violation of which is liable to cost the offender $7.20 in fines or imprisonment up to eight days.

Munich, with a population of half a million, has the most modern of all the European municipal markets. It was opened in February, 1912, and embodies the improvements suggested by experience of market administration in other cities.

The total cost was $797,000, of which $510,000 was spent on four communicating iron market halls, with their cellar accommodation underneath; $190,000 on a receiving and toll department; $52,000 on a group of adjacent buildings, including a post office, restaurant, and beer garden; and $45,000 on roadways. The whole establishment covers 46,500 square meters, of which the market halls occupy 37,100 square meters.

At the northern extremity of the buildings is the toll and receiving department, where produce is delivered at special sidings connected with the south railway station of the city. Next comes a succession of lofty halls, with covered connections, terminating in a small retail section and the administration offices. At the northern end of the great market is a section where express delivery traffic is dealt with, while the western side is occupied with sidings for loading produce sold to buyers from other German centers.

Below the tollhouse and the market generally are vast cold-storage cellars and refrigerating plants for the preservation of surplus supplies till the demand in the market above calls for their delivery. Each market hall is devoted to a separate section of produce, and the cellars below are correspondingly distinct, so that there is an absence of confusion, orderliness is insured, and rapid deliveries facilitated. Across the underground space from north to south runs three roadways, while down the center from east to west a further broad aisle is provided, with an equipment of great hydraulic lifts. There are nine of these lifts altogether for heavy consignments, while each stand owner in the market has, in addition, a small lift connecting his stand and storage cellar.

Both market halls and underground cellars are so constructed as to facilitate ventilation and complete cleanliness. The floors are of concrete, and every stand is fitted with running water, with which all the fittings have to be scoured every day. There is both roof and side light and ample ventilation, while the entrances are wind-screened to prevent dust. Electric light is used underground, and the cellars are inspected as strictly as the upper halls, to insure due attention to hygiene. In the center of each market hall there are offices and writing rooms for those using the markets. In the restaurant 150 can be served with meals at one time, or they can be accommodated with seats in the beer garden.

Associated with this market establishment is a great cattle market and range of slaughterhouses on a neighboring site. The live-cattle market dates back for centuries, but the present accommodation was only completed in May, 1904, at a total cost of $1,600,000.

Last year 809,508 animals were sold, including 432,159 swine and 234,457 calves. In the slaughterhouses 713,228 of these were killed, besides 2,619 horses and 97 dogs. About 25 per cent of the animals reach the market by road from neighboring farms, while 75 per cent come by rail. For the inspection of all flesh foods there are very strict rules, enforced by the chief veterinary surgeon, Dr. Müller, and a staff of specially trained assistants. As in Berlin, extensive bathrooms are provided for the slaughterhouse staff, and baths are available at nominal charges. Though the new market halls have not been established long enough to provide a definite financial statement, the live-cattle market and slaughterhouses do afford an indication of the success of municipal administration in Munich. Last year the income was $416,500 and the expenditure $410,100, thus showing a profit of $6,400. The new produce halls are certainly the best equipped in the world, and the only element of doubt as to their success arises from the fact that three old-fashioned open markets are nearer the center of the city, and for that reason are even now preferred by many retailers. This fact emphasizes the importance of selecting a central position in establishing a municipal terminal market.

FRANCE.

Paris has one of the most skillfully organized municipal market systems in Europe. The chief food distribution center for the 3,000,000 Parisians is established at the Halles Centrales, a series of 10 pavilions covering 22 acres of ground and intervening streets. Altogether this great terminal market has cost the city more than $10,000,000.

Most of the pavilions are entirely for the wholesale trade, but some are used as retail markets to a limited extent. Retail traders are being decreased gradually, so that whereas in 1904 there were 1,164 retail stands there are now only 856.

The total receipts of the Halles Centrales and 30 local markets amount to $2,100,000, of which about $1,000,000 is profit. There is a general advance in the wholesale trade, but the local covered markets, or marchés de quartier, are not progressing in the same way, so the city does not quite maintain a steady level of market profit.

The reasons given for the falling off of the retail trade are various, but the principal causes appear to be (1) the growth of big stores, with local branches, that deliver the goods at the door, thus relieving the purchaser of the necessity of taking home market supplies; (2) the number of perambulating produce salesmen, who sell from carts in the street at low rates, having neither store rent nor market tolls to pay, and (3) the growth of cooperative societies.

A complicated and severe code of regulations governs the markets. Commission salesmen at the Halles Centrales must be French citizens of unblemished record and must give a bond of not less than $1,000 in proof of solvency. Producers may have their supplies sold either at auction or by private treaty, as they prefer, and as none of the agents are allowed to do business for themselves the distant growers have confidence in the market methods.

In the retail markets each dealer in fresh meat pays just under $6 a week in all, while dealers in salted meats, fish, game, and vegetables pay a much lower rate. All, however, in the covered markets pay three taxes—one for the right to occupy a stand, one for the cleaning and arranging of the markets, and one for the maintenance of guardians and officials. In the open markets the stands are rented by the day, week, or year, the rate for the day ranging from 10 to 30 cents, according to space. Several of these local markets have charters dating back to prerevolution days, that can not now be annulled.

It would be difficult to devise a more thorough system of inspection. An average year's seizures include half a million pounds of meat, 17,000 pounds of fruit and vegetables, and a half a million pounds of salt-water fish.

Thus the Paris market arrangements provide an admirable central clearing house, where supplies are inspected and sold under such conditions as to prevent the artificial raising of prices. It also acts as a feeder to the marchés de quartier, to the great convenience of local consumers. Moreover, the producer is safeguarded, for on his supplies a small fixed percentage only can be charged by the salesman, and the current market prices are made public by agents especially detailed for that purpose.

Havre, the well-known French seaport, with a population of 130,000, has a profit of over 6 per cent on the Halles Centrales and 10 per cent on the fish market. All told, there is a profit of $27,000 on the 12 municipal markets.

The Halles Centrales occupy an entire square in the center of the city, and cost $75,000, exclusive of the site. Gardeners and farmers are not permitted to sell their produce on the way to the market, and are only allowed to deliver to storekeepers after the wholesale markets are closed. Here, as elsewhere where the markets are successful, every precaution is taken to avoid the prosperity of the market being dissipated by sales in the surrounding neighborhood. The annual rents for butchers are very moderate, ranging from $57.90 to $154.40; vegetable dealers, $42.85 to $92.64; dairy-produce dealers, $52.11 to $85.11; fishmongers, $23.16 to $86.85. In the wholesale markets there is an annual trade turnover worth well above $1,000,000, of which fish represents $280,000. So far from the fishermen finding the fish market detrimental to their interests, they welcome it and cheerfully observe the rule forbidding sales on the quays or transit sheds except under special permits.

Lyon, with a population of half a million, may be taken as the best example of a flourishing French provincial city at a considerable distance from the sea. The principal market, La Halle, is known all over France for its public auctions. Accommodation is provided for 276 stalls, rented at 14 cents a day per square meter for fruit, vegetables, and cheese, while other stalls for meat and fish are rented at 33 cents per square meter.

At the morning auctions, held at the rear of the hall, are sold immense quantities of fish, oysters, lobsters, game, poultry, butter, cheese, eggs, fruit, and vegetables. There is a rule that all supplies must come from outside Lyon, so that local store men can not there dispose of surplus stocks, but dealers in other French cities often thus relieve themselves when overloaded. These auctions not only enable local dealers to distribute supplies at cheap rates to the small stores all over the city, but wide awake housewives can frequently tell just what the stores gave wholesale for the produce offered to them retail later in the day, so a check can be kept on overcharges.

The auctioneers are given a monopoly of selling for 10 years, on binding themselves to pay to the city a sum equal to 2 per cent on the total annual sales. The minimum is fixed at $1,930 for one stand, or $5,650 for four stands, to be paid to the municipal treasury. Two per cent is added to the purchase price of every payment made by buyers at auction, and if this does not amount to $1,930 per stand for the year the auctioneer has to make up the difference. The poorer classes benefit largely by these sales, banding together to buy wholesale and then dividing their purchases.

There are also 17 markets for general retail trade in Lyon. The Terminal Market of La Halle cost the city $886,980. The company which built it was given a concession for 50 years on a division of profits arrangement, but within 16 months the utility of the market as an advantageous enterprise for the city was so clearly demonstrated that the municipality bought the company out.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

Vienna, with 1,700,000 people to supply, has a magnificently managed system of 45 markets, 7 of which are located in large, well-ventilated halls, all kept spotlessly clean.

Market commissioners appointed by the municipality conduct the business of the markets according to strict regulations, enforcing a rigid inspection of all products as well as weights and measures. Violations of these rules are punishable by fines of about $2, imprisonment for 24 hours, or exclusion from the markets. Such penalties are enforced when buyers are defrauded, dealers oppose the market authority, or exceed the charges that are posted in the market.

Not merely land and water produce, but general farm and household requisites, are sold at these markets. Outside buying is strictly controlled, owners of boats on the Danube or wagons on the public streets paying toll to the municipality on any sales.

Over $60,000 profit is the average annual yield of the markets to the city treasury, and it is generally agreed that the market system tends to keep down the price of foodstuffs to normal levels.

Budapest has 715,000 people and a very complete market system, under which, though only nominal rentals are charged, there is a profit of over $100,000.

There is one large wholesale terminal market, while six local markets cater for the retail requirements of all quarters of the city. All salesmen are carefully selected, criminals and diseased persons being rigidly excluded. Though a wide variety of articles are sold in the smaller markets besides farm produce, storekeepers are not allowed to rent stalls, so the market men and farmers alone have the use of the buildings. The regulations under which they trade were drawn up by a market commission and confirmed by ministerial decrees. These regulations are regarded in Europe as a model of comprehensiveness, and their observance insures close attention to hygiene. Among the rules is one insisting on the placing of all waste paper in the public refuse receptacles, while another compels the use of new, clean paper only in wrapping up food products.

Stalls are rented from 4 to 10 cents a day, according to the accommodation. Supplies come by boat, rail, and wagon, and when there is pressure on the interior market space sales are allowed from the boats and wagons at a toll of 10 cents a day. Otherwise only merchandise is allowed to be sold outside the market halls. Not only must no fish, game, meat, or poultry be sold without first being passed by the veterinary inspectors, but none of these articles of diet must be brought to market packed in straw, cloth, or paper. Unripe fruit must not be sold to children.

Every day a bulletin, issued by the market commission, sets out the wholesale prices, while a weekly list gives the retail prices, but in the latter case the note is added that the market commission will not be responsible for any controversy that may arise. All the stocks held by the market traders are insured by the municipality, though not to their full value.

Not only have these markets proved beneficial to the consumers generally, but the market men are unanimous as to their advantage, for they afford a ready and inexpensive means of doing a large business.

HOLLAND.

Amsterdam, with a population of 510,000, has all the local markets under the control of the municipality. They are divided into five districts, each managed by a director or market master responsible to the city council.

Two of the markets are covered, but the remainder are open and are situated by the side of the canals, along which the produce is brought in boats from the farms around. On the administration of the markets in an average year there is a profit of $36,000, but there is a law against making a profit on municipal enterprises, so the surplus is spent on local improvements.

Rotterdam, another great Dutch seaport, operates its markets under similar conditions and makes a profit of $34,000, of which $23,000 comes from the cattle and meat markets.

BELGIUM.

Brussels, possessing a population of half a million, reaps considerable advantage from its picturesque municipal markets, four of which are covered, while several are in the open air.

The renting of space to stand holders at the central market is according to the highest bidder, provided the price is not below $11.58 per month for meat, $9.65 for poultry and game, $5.79 for fruit, vegetables, butter, and cheese.

Both producers and dealers sell at these markets, all their supplies being subjected to drastic inspection regulations. All meats are tested by the municipal veterinary surgeon and his staff, while a communal chemist regulates the milk, butter, and general dairy produce. The cleansing of the markets is done by the department of public cleanliness. Some of the public markets are managed by a contractor, who receives $250.90 a year for setting up the stalls and keeping them in good order. He deposits a security on undertaking his contract, and in default of a satisfactory performance of his work the commune does it and charges him with it.

COMMENTS.

It has been testified that New York's annual food supply costs at the railroad and steamer terminals, $350,000,000. But the consumers pay $500,000,000 for it. The balance of $150,000,000 does not necessarily indicate that any particular section of middlemen have been exacting excessive profits. It merely demonstrates that too many people handle the produce between the farm and the fireside. The provision of an adequate terminal market system for New York would apply the remedy.

New York stands alone, for a city of its importance, in having to face an annual deficit on its markets. The results elsewhere prove that the deficit could be turned into a profit by the creation of a terminal-market system, equipped and administered on twentieth century lines.

America is exporting less foodstuffs than formerly. The annual value has fallen $126,000,000 in 11 years. The growth of the manufacturing population and the relative decrease of the agricultural population, together with the gradual impoverishment of much of our farm land, will soon make conditions worse unless we organize our food distribution.

The first step for New York is the establishment of a terminal-market system. It is estimated that New York's population will continue to grow at the rate of fully 100,000 a year, so this problem admits of no further procrastination.

In natural resources America is the richest country in the world. Other nations have to import vast quantities of produce because of the restricted area of their territory, the comparative unfruitfulness of their soil, or their adverse climatic conditions. We have a wide land of boundless fertility, never wholly in the grip of winter's cold. Yet we no more escape the high cost of living than these less favored people overseas. They have partially compensated for the disadvantages by organizing their markets, while we have neglected that important branch of civic enterprise.

Everywhere in Europe the provision of adequate terminal markets under municipal control is pointed to as a powerful aid in keeping food prices down. There is a lesson in that for New York and other American cities.

There is a lesson also for growers in up-State districts, for experience shows that with adequate markets, supplying produce at lower rates, there comes a demand for more farm and garden stuff and a greater variety of it. This directly aids in developing rural prosperity and enhances the value of agricultural land.

I believe a marked improvement will be shown if a bureau is maintained to inform farmers as to the demands of the market and the best method of packing, preparing, and dispatching their produce so as to reach the market in prime condition. Not only will that aid the market, but it will have a powerful influence in arresting "the drift from the land" to the cities.

The municipality should select central positions for its markets, with rail and river access. It should have effective control not only over the markets but the adjacent streets, wharves, and railroad sidings, so as to obviate evasion of the market tolls. The rentals should not be high, and no subletting should be allowed under any circumstances.

Under such conditions, with wise administration, New York's terminal-market system could be made a model that would be studied by other cities in an age when economic questions absorb the attention of all our public-spirited men and women.

In the interests of the people's health and happiness, no less than in consideration of the municipal finances, all should rally to the support of those who are seeking to secure the consummation of this urgent reform at the earliest possible moment consistent with a full consideration of all its aspects.

TOLLS ON THE PANAMA CANAL (H. DOC. NO. 1313).

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a House document an article prepared by the law officer of the Isthmian Canal Commission, Mr. Frank Feuille, regarding tolls on the Panama Canal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to print as a House document an article on tolls on the Panama Canal. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the minority leader, I move the election of Mr. CHARLES H. SLOAN, of Nebraska, to fill a vacancy that belongs to the minority on the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is there any other nomination? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and Mr. SLOAN was elected to fill the vacancy.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Wilkinsburg, Pa., praying for the passage of the so-called Kenyon-Sheppard interstate liquor bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to create a board of river regulation, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented memorials of the congregations of the Seventh-day Adventist Churches of Leslie, Watrousville, Bay City, Spring Arbor, Marine City, Scottville, Otter Lake, and Clifford Lake, all in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation compelling the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I present a telegram from Charles H. Beckwith, counsel of the Board of Trade of Springfield, Mass., which I ask may be read and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the telegram was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., January 27, 1913.

Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

It is absolutely necessary to obtain adequate navigation on Connecticut River for western Massachusetts that Connecticut River bill be passed without amendment at this session of Congress.

SPRINGFIELD BOARD OF TRADE,
CHARLES H. BECKWITH, Counsel.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia presented an affidavit in support of the bill (S. 2043) granting a pension to R. L. Miller, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of the Anacostia Citizens' Association, of the District of Columbia, praying that an increase be made in the police force of the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

KIOWA AND COMANCHE INDIAN RESERVATIONS (S. DOC. NO. 1046).

Mr. OWEN. I present a memorial from the governor of Oklahoma, relative to certain lands granted to the State of Oklahoma within the Kiowa and Comanche Reservations. I ask that the memorial, with the accompanying illustration, be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

Mr. WORKS. I submit some additional press clippings from the various newspapers in the country bearing upon Senate joint resolution No. 78. I do this because of the claim made on the floor of the Senate that no public interest is being taken in this proposed constitutional amendment. I ask that the clippings may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Opinions of the press in 1912, compiled by the National Business League of America, preliminary to its nation-wide campaign for a single six-year term for the President of the United States, with ineligibility forever thereafter.

[From the Age, Birmingham, Ala.]

Congressman CLAYTON, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, presents a brief but strong report in support of the proposed constitutional proposition to extend the presidential term to six years and to render a President ineligible to a second term, even though a Vice President succeed to the office and had served but a small fraction of a full term.

Mr. CLAYTON urges the adoption of the proposition because it would lead to higher efficiency in administration, and it would put an end to machine building in the highest office in the gift of the people.

The common sense of the voters will put the proposition into the Constitution if Congress can be induced to submit it. Once ratified it would put an end not only to third-term movements but also to second terms, which are nearly as vicious.

[From the Advertiser, Montgomery, Ala.]

Inasmuch as the proposition of Representative CLAYTON, of Alabama, to make a presidential term six years has been in the minds of the people for some months, and has met with more or less favor, it is entirely probable that six years and not four will be the final choice of the party when the amendment is submitted to the people.

[From the Republican, Phoenix, Ariz.]

The sentiment in favor of a single presidential term is spreading. Senator WORKS has introduced a bill providing for a single term, and the Indiana Republican convention last week adopted a resolution in favor of a single term of six years.

The only objection that might be offered would be that six years might be too long a period; that within that time the people might desire a change of policies. In that respect a four-year term would be better. There is nothing, however, to be said in favor of two terms. If at the end of the President's term the people are satisfied with his policies and the manner of their execution, they may elect another man committed to them.

Under our present system a President, though he might prefer to retire to private life, is practically compelled to seek a renomination and a reelection as an indorsement of his administration.

[From the Herald, Fresno, Cal.]

There is much to be said in favor of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States to increase the presidential term to six years and to make an incumbent forever ineligible for reelection. The longer term would reduce the frequency of elections, lengthen the period between the seasons of business disturbance caused by presidential contests, and give the incumbent all the time necessary to carry out his policies.

[From the Call, San Francisco, Cal.]

General discussion in the press of the country brings out a strong sentiment in favor of the proposition to amend the National Constitution by making the term of President six years and prohibiting reelection. The idea is as old as the Republic. Seven States in the convention of 1787 favored a seven-year term, without right of reelection, and only two States were opposed. Later nine States voted for a six-year term, and only one was opposed. Just why the present plan was finally adopted has never been clearly explained.

The weight of authority favors the change proposed. President Jackson, in 1829, recommended a six-year term without reelection. President Hayes and President Grant followed this example, with this difference, that Grant favored a seven-year term. President Taft has indorsed the proposition, and there is reason to believe that a majority of the present Congress favors it.

[From the Telegram, Bridgeport, Conn.]

With nothing to fear or to hope for at the end of a six-year term, knowing that it would bring with it noneligibility either to a succeeding or a nonconsecutive lease of power, the President would be a disinterested servant of the people for every moment of his service, and those who hold minor offices would cease from troubling. All concerned might be persuaded to remember that they are making history and therefore induced to do their best.

[From the Herald, New Britain, Conn.]

A six-year term would be a distinct advantage to the country, for the reason that it would insure the occupant of the Presidency giving his complete attention to the affairs of state and not to strengthening himself for another term. In other words, he would not play politics. No sooner is a man inaugurated President than he begins to build fences for a second term, and it is a sort of unwritten law that he should be retained in office. This may be desirable with the tenure of office four years, but it would not be desirable if the term was six years. A President would then have an opportunity to work out his governmental policies through three Congresses and in this way would be able to benefit the country more than under the present system. It has been said that if the President was a good man and rendered valuable service, that he should be retained in office, but that argument is neither wise nor logical. To do that would probably mean the establishment of a machine that would soon become corrupt and difficult to remove from power.

[From the Journal-Courier, New Haven, Conn.]

President Taft would limit the presidential office to a single term of six years, and he gives a new reason why he thinks so. He says, "I am a little specific in this matter, because it seems necessary to be, so in order to be understood, I don't care how unambitious or modest a President is, I don't care how determined he is that he himself will not secure his renomination (and there are very few indeed who go to that extent), still his subordinates equally interested with him in his reelection will, whenever they have the opportunity, exert their influence and divide their time between the public service and the effort to secure their chief's renomination and reelection. It is different to prevent the whole administration from losing a part of its effectiveness for the public good by this diversion to political effort for at least a year of the four of each administration." The single term, then, of six years will achieve two results—it will leave the Chief Executive free to give his best service to the people without temptation of any kind and it will greatly increase the efficiency of the whole administration of government.

[From the Register, New Haven, Conn.]

There are positive arguments for the change. Four years is too short a time for a President to accomplish anything, chiefly because more or less of his time is wasted by the ambition to succeed himself. Increase his term by 50 per cent and relieve him of all worry to the future and you have by at least 100 per cent increased his net effectiveness for the term. Six years is nearly the cycle of man's physical renewal. It is a time in which the able man might accomplish something. Set that as at once his incentive and his limit—his incentive to make his impress on the history of his country then or not at all, his protection as well as his limit—and men worthy to be our Presidents will show a difference in their accomplishments in the office.

[From The Times, Leavenworth, Kans.]

There are many reasons in favor of making this change. Chief of these is, of course, the oft-repeated argument that it would take from the President the motive of ambition to be reelected, and from the beginning of the administration he would be thinking only of giving the country a creditable administration. In such case the politician would have less influence with him and the statesman more. With no second term in which to amend his record a President would use his utmost endeavors to make the best possible record during his one term.

That the proposed amendment would add greatly to the dignity of the office of President can readily be seen. It would make the President more independent, less sensitive to criticism, and after a time less criticized. It would place him where there would be no temptation to take part in unseemly struggles for office, and soon the office of President would come to be looked upon as is that of justice of the Supreme Court—as an office to be filled only by men of high character and learning and men of unquestioned honor and patriotism.

[From the Chicago Journal, Chicago, Ill.]

It is the duty of Congress to pass the single-term, six-year amendment at once. That amendment must provide that no person who has served six years in the White House shall be eligible to election under the new rule. If this amendment is put through Congress without delay the people will have time to ratify it before 1916; and the country will be spared a great deal of trouble and expense.

[From the Chicago Daily News, Chicago, Ill.]

Congress evidently is not willing at this time to consider on its merits the Works resolution for a constitutional amendment providing a single term of six years for each President and Vice President of the United States. In the Senate the other day debate on the resolution was turned into a political dispute as to the relative magnitude of the indiscretions committed by the men now seeking the Presidency. In the House a similar resolution has been shelved until the next session of Congress. Friends of this desirable reform, however, should not permit it to be thrust aside for any great length of time. It must come, and the sooner it comes the better.

So many abuses in government are bred by the second-term frenzy that attacks nearly every President as soon as he sets foot within the White House, that the people of the Nation would gladly lengthen the term of each Executive by two years in exchange for the privilege of making a really good official out of him, through the simple expedient of denying him a reelection.

The contention advanced by supporters of the present system that a President would have no adequate incentive to give good service to the people if the inducement of a second term were not held out to him is insincere. It is perfectly well known that the prospect of a second term is a demoralizing prospect. It unnerves the Executive arm far more frequently than does anything else. Its influence is good in no respect.

In urging Congress to pass the Works resolution its supporters insist that the President of the United States should be freed from the temptation to "play politics." Right, not political expediency, must direct Executive action in the White House.

[From the Record-Herald, Chicago, Ill.]

The proposed amendment to the Constitution restricting the President to one term of six years probably will bring forward few fresh arguments. It is an old question, as old, indeed, as the Government itself, and the wisdom of so restricting the Chief Executive's term has been debated at intervals since the time of Jackson. Yet the later arguments in favor of the reform are strikingly similar to those advanced when the fathers were framing the Government.

The perils of leaving a President free to succeed himself if he can have been considered by students of our form of Government from the first. De Tocqueville considered them, Bryce refers to them, and M. Otrogorski, in his Democracy and the Party System in the United States, published in 1910, gives it as his opinion that the reelection of the President must be prohibited. The Russian critic states his case after this fashion:

"The rescue of the Federal service from politics must be completed by submitting it to no influence but that of the Chief Executive and his principal officers throughout the country, and to no end but that of the public weal. Not only from the bosses at Washington must the President be emancipated, but from the party machine altogether. And that can not be achieved so long as the President looks for reelection. The presidential term should be lengthened to seven years and the reelection of the President prohibited."

There, in brief, is the argument of those who have opposed the reelection of the President, though it has been given in much more detail by other writers and speakers. But the gist of the matter is that the President must not be a politician. He must not use the great powers of his office to insure reelection. His appointments must not be made with an eye on the support of State bosses; he must not be tempted to lay aside his convictions and play the demagogue in order to win votes; his dignity must not suffer from a scramble to keep in his seat.

Said Mr. Randolph, speaking in the constitutional convention, "If he (the President) ought to be independent, he should not be left under a temptation to court a reappointment."

This thought seemed to have pursued the members of the convention from the very moment they began to consider the powers which were to be vested in the Chief Executive. On August 6 the committee of detail, to whom had been referred the various proposals, reported in favor of electing a President for a seven-year term and making him ineligible for a second term. This proposal in different forms was considered again and again.

There were some present who felt that a Chief Executive's dignity must suffer through being forced to join the mass again as a common citizen. To these spoke "Dr." Franklin, with his dry humor:

"In free governments the rulers are the servants and the people their superiors and sovereigns. For the former, therefore, to return among the latter was not to degrade but to promote them. And it would be imposing an unreasonable burden on them to keep them always in a state of servitude and not allow them to become again one of the masters."

In the end the convention took no action restricting the President's eligibility for reelection. It was not till the time of Jackson that the question again became a real issue. Jackson's friends said during the campaign that he would not consent to run a second time, and this declaration is thought to have added to the popularity of the candidate. He was a stanch supporter of the principle of one term when he took over the office of President. In his first message to Congress, in December, 1829, he suggested the wisdom of restricting the President to one term. In his annual message of the following year he said:

"In order, particularly, that this appointee may be placed beyond the reach of any improper influence, in order that he may approach the solemn responsibilities of the highest office in the gift of a free people, uncommitted to any other course than the strict line of constitutional duty, and that the securities for this independence may be rendered as strong as the nature of power and the weakness of its possessor will admit, I can not too earnestly invite your attention to the propriety of promoting such amendment of the Constitution as will render him ineligible after one term of service."

There can be little doubt that Jackson was sincere in his efforts to have the President's term restricted, notwithstanding the fact that he stood for reelection himself. It is pretty generally admitted that up to the time of his death he continued to believe what he had charged in his first campaign, that there was a cabal to continue President Adams in office, and that he had performed an important public service in defeating its plans.

Certain it is that from the time of Jackson down to Lincoln a clearly defined popular prejudice existed against the idea of a second term for the Chief Magistrate. This prejudice was overcome in the case of Lincoln by the demands of an extraordinary situation.

Later on the question of restricting the Executive's term was brought before the public when President Grant showed a desire for a third term. But even when he became the candidate of his party for a second term there were those who objected strenuously. Chief of these was Horace Greeley, who, having alienated a considerable portion of his own party, became the candidate of the Democratic and Liberal Republican Parties against Grant. During the campaign which ensued the issue of the second term was raised, and Mr. Greeley opposed it with all the eloquence and force for which he was noted.

In an article contributed to a now defunct periodical called the Galaxy, in 1872, Mr. Greeley said:

"All that is needed is an intelligent, earnest, widespread conviction that the practice of reelecting a Chief Magistrate while in office is fraught with evil and peril; that it distracts his attention from the proper cares and duties of his station and impels him to consider not who are the fittest and most worthy to fill the offices in his gift, but what choice will be most likely to improve his chances of renomination.

"Here is the right man for the Supreme Court, who has no influential clique at his back; here is a rival who is neither so capable nor so worthy, but whose friends control the party machine in a populous State and can send delegates to the approaching national convention either for or against the incumbent of the White House; who that knows human nature can doubt that the less fit aspirant has the better prospect of obtaining that judgeship? And this instance may stand for a thousand."

Speakers and writers of that day who joined in the discussion were accustomed to point to at least one excellence in the constitution of the Confederate States so recently overthrown. That constitution, they said, reflected at least one bit of experience which the Federal Government had had and had failed to benefit by. It made the President ineligible to succeed himself.

[From the Mail, Moline, Ill.]

Every argument for a one-term limitation is sound. Not one argument so far advanced against it bears dissection. By making the term of the President six years and barring him from again seeking the office, he will be left to work solely for the good of the country from the first day.

[From the Chronicle, Marion, Ind.]

There is soundness and wisdom in Mr. Taft's suggestion of a single term of six years for our Presidents. The gain to the people would be obvious and very great. In many ways a presidential campaign is a public nuisance. The minds of the people are distracted, business, whether foolishly or not, has acquired the habit of coming to a halt, as though some great calamity impended—probably Mr. Taft will recall, not without a reminiscent smile, that during the late campaign something was said about the closing of factory doors in case the voting went wrong—and men, women, too, are drenched with a flood of utterance and wearied with passionate mouthings. It is unnecessary; it is stupid. If we should reduce the frequency of the national upheaval from three times in 12 years to twice in 12 years the gain would be immense. There would be the added and important advantage of shielding the incumbent of the office from the temptation to use power and patronage in the effort to secure a second term.

[From the Gazette, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.]

A six-year term would make the country more democratic. It would prevent the building up of political machines whose main purpose is to perpetuate some man or set of men in office.

The six-year term would give a President a better opportunity to make good. It would be unproductive of harm, because the Nation always elects a fairly representative man to the Chief Magistracy.

A six-year term would lessen the political turmoil, and that alone would be worth a great deal more than "the price of admission."

By all means let us have the single six-year term.

[From the Times-Democrat, New Orleans, La.]

More than one presidential record has been marred by this seeking after a second term. During two years out of the four the desire for renomination influences, to a greater or less extent, the average Executive's official acts and colors his view of pending issues and questions. There is no reason to believe that we can, under the present system, get entirely away from that practice and custom. But by rigid limitation of the President's term of service, definitely fixed by the law of the land, we can relieve the Executive of the temptation now placed in his way. Measurably we can insure that he will serve the Nation during his full term of office instead of using his office for a part of the term to serve his own ambitions and candidacy for renomination. An aggressive campaign for the adoption of the one-term plan ought to be organized, we think, at once, while its wisdom and necessity are so widely admitted by the voters.

[From the Times, Cumberland, Md.]

Some unconscious humorist assures the Chicago Record-Herald that "there is no public sentiment" in favor of the single six-year presidential term proposed.

We are bound to admit that we have heard no riotous demonstrations by advocates of such an amendment to the Constitution. But the majority of the Members of Congress favor it; the respective Judiciary Committees of the two Houses have indorsed it; progressive and independent newspapers are urging it; and men of light and leading in every part of the country are "coming out" for it. The National Business League of America is working for it.

In the Senate two insurgents, CUMMINS and WORKS, are fathering the amendment, and some of its opponents are threatening a filibuster to prevent action on the resolution submitting it. They know that it will pass if it reaches a vote.

The unconscious humorist or noise-loving editors who fail to discover public sentiment for the amendment should try to understand that public sentiment is not always expressed by stormy mass meetings addressed by excited orators.

[From the Gazette, Haverhill, Mass.]

There is nothing in the Constitution as it now is to prevent a life tenure of the presidential office. When the Constitution was created no one had any reason to suppose that the Executive department would become so powerful as it has become. Nothing has stood in the way of long-continued tenure of the presidential office but wholesome public sentiment and the antithird-term tradition, which arose from Washington's refusal of a third election. If that tradition is once violated and the barriers against a third term are broken down, they may be down for a long time.

A President in office who is a candidate for reelection has an undue advantage over other candidates in his own party for the nomination, and an undue advantage over his opponent of the other party in the election.

We are coming to the one-term Presidency as rapidly as the circumstances will permit. The present campaign has made sentiment in that direction, and the Clayton resolution may be the means of achieving the result earlier than expected.

[From the Evening Union, Springfield, Mass.]

Six years has been suggested as a reasonable limit, and there are many pronounced advocates of the six-year single-term idea, but there are some that favor a single four-year term and others that believe in making it eight years. The arguments in favor of one are as good as those in support of another, except, perhaps, that the four-year term may be a little too short to enable a President to carry out the policies and pledges to which he and his party are committed. But the main idea, the single-term limit, has everything to commend it.

[From the Call, Paterson, N. J.]

Many influential men of New York, when asked to comment on the question of a constitutional amendment limiting the President to a single six-year term, expressed themselves favorable to the change. Some thought it would make for greater stability in the business of the country, but it was generally believed by both Republicans and Democrats that the most important effect would be that on the conduct of the incumbent of the office himself. Most of them agreed that under the present four-year term, with eligibility for reelection, the President, no matter how well intentioned he may be, is unavoidably drawn into a certain amount of political intriguing that inevitably interferes with the discharge of his duties in a broad and statesmanlike manner.

[From the Chautauquan, Chautauqua, N. Y.]

Andrew Jackson thought that a single term without reelection for a President under any circumstances would add another safeguard to our liberties. Second terms are not now feared as threats to our liberties; whether third or fourth terms are a menace and danger is a matter upon which opinion differs. But what is undeniable and clear is that second and third terms are incompatible with efficient and single-minded public service. The best of men can not be exposed to constant temptation. The temptation of incumbents to use patronage, to build or strengthen machines, to "mend fences," to make sure of delegates, to control conventions, is too strong to be resisted in most cases.

Nor is this all. Men in office who are candidates for second or third terms may, and generally do, consider bills and policies from the political or personal point of view. Some do it unconsciously, but all do it more or less. The incumbent who is not and can not be a candidate again for the same office is free to deal with public matters on their merits, to use his independent and sincere judgment, to make the public good his sole test or concern. This would be an enormous gain to good government and to "the rule of the people."

The more the question is studied the more vital and progressive the single-term idea is seen to be. There is not the least danger that the supply of presidential "timber" will ever be so restricted that second or third terms will be necessary. No man or set of men is really indispensable to an age or generation or nation. Any vigorous, sound body politic contains many men and women who are fit to do the work of the day. To dip into the great mass of citizens and select administrators and servants with an eye to results, without overestimating any individual or underestimating the virtue and intelligence of his equals, is not always an easy task. But stable and prosperous democracies must endeavor to do this very thing. The single six-year presidential term idea is consonant with the warnings of history and with common sense.

[From the Leader-Republican, Gloversville, N. Y.]

Much, indeed, might be advanced in favor of the single six-year term as Chief Executive of the Nation, and in the opinion of the Leader-Republican a long step in the right direction will have been taken when discussion of the change proposed shall have been crystallized into favorable action. As yet the proposal is a comparatively new one, but it is one which from its practical nature seems destined to grow and expand in favor with the people.

[From the Financial World, New York City.]

All classes, even the chronic office-holding politicians, whatever may be their party affiliations or opinions, will hail with satisfaction the preliminary efforts now being made in Congress to submit to the several States an amendment to the National Constitution, so as to extend the presidential term to six years and make the incumbent ineligible to succeed himself.

It would prove a most excellent move if this same rule of nonsuccession were carried further to include every elective office. Politicians are more or less selfish in the consideration of the general welfare, although statesmen in office affect to believe that the interests they have in public affairs—national, State, and local—are above all personal consideration. However, if that interest is not personally touching the pocketbook of officeholders, it is at least fed on the ambition to hold on as long as possible to the honors heaped upon them by their fellowmen. Man would not be man without ambitions.

But limit the Presidency and other elective offices to one term and the probabilities are that the men so honored will apply to their stewardship the very best ability, sincerity, and honesty that is in them. They will realize that there is no further reward to seek when their term of office ends.

The little Republic of Switzerland has demonstrated conclusively the great advantages that lie in limiting offices of state to only one term. One term is enough.

[From the Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.]

We have confidence that the people and the States will soon set a prohibition of more than a single term in the Constitution itself, incidentally lengthening the one term from four to six years, with no reelection, as could wisely have been done at the start. The term could well be lengthened to reduce strain on a term of the present duration.

It could well be made incapable of repetition, to remove from any President the temptation to pervert his service and patronage to the continuance of himself in place and to stir in each party the growth of statesmen fit to make into Presidents.

[From the Financial World, New York City.]

This much-to-be-desired reform can only be satisfactorily brought about by limiting the Presidency to one term and making that term half as long again as the present four-year tenure. Six years seems generally agreed upon as long enough to allow a new Executive to put through such political measures to which he is committed and on which he has made his campaign for the high office.

It is undeniably true that business halts more or less during a national campaign, if for no other reason than is to be found in the natural hesitating against going ahead when there is the possibility of a change of administration and with it a flood of new laws to which business will have to adjust itself. Six years, therefore, would give to business a period of rest from radical adjustments longer than is possible under our four-year system.

But the greatest handicap the country suffers under our present scheme of electing our Chief Executive is to be found in the right of succession, on which at present there is no limitation. Not a single bar is up to prevent a President succeeding himself as often as he may be able to prevail upon the electors to keep him in office. Only custom is in the way. This was set by George Washington in refusing a third nomination, contending that by serving twice as President he had done his duty toward his country and the people.

The one and the greatest advantage in the one-term movement for President, and which offsets any of the minor defects that may be cited, is that it would effectively do away with the political maneuvering now indulged in by a President in his natural ambition to become his own successor. With one term only possible to him, every President would give the country the best administration within his ability irrespective of political considerations, and more than that could not be expected. Naturally, he would desire that his administration should pass into history as one reflecting fame upon him, and he would act accordingly.

The one-term plan would forever blast the political ambitions which every President now keeps in mind to maintain himself in office through two terms at least, and which so often proves an obstacle to an impartial administration.

[From the Herald, New York City.]

President Taft's plea for one term of six years for the President of the United States will undoubtedly give new impetus to this measure now before Congress.

The reform must come in the shape of a constitutional amendment, and after the bill has passed both Houses and become a law the amendment must be ratified by three-fourths of the States. But cumbersome as the process of amending the Constitution is, this great reform may be much nearer than persons generally suppose.

There has long been a very strong feeling in this country that two terms of four years each are enough for a President. Many persons believe that to limit the only term to six years is too short a period and would extend it to eight years.

With this view the Herald heartily agrees. The term should be eight years instead of six, and then there should be a proviso against any man ever seeking the Presidency again. Indeed, it might be wise to make some financial provisions for retiring Presidents.

But eight years are not too much. Washington served almost eight years; Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, and Grant served eight years; Lincoln and McKinley were reelected, but were assassinated before the end of their second terms; Cleveland was elected to a second term after a four years' interim, and Roosevelt was elected to a second term, having filled the uncompleted term of McKinley as his first term.

But to have a President elected for an eight-year term would free the country from much strife, and to provide that there should be but one term would be bound to work for national security.

[From the Evening Journal, New York City.]

Mrs. George J. Gould said to-day that she was an advocate of extending the term of the President of the United States to six years. She thinks that the longer period would give an opportunity for working out presidential reforms, and that a President who could not get a renomination would be less apt to play into the hands of the politicians. She would limit the six-year President to a single term.

"The Presidency of the United States has become the most powerful in the world," she said at her home, No. 657 Fifth Avenue. "So much responsibility and work devolve upon the incumbent of that high office that I sometimes marvel at the ability with which Presidents meet the obligations that are imposed upon them.

"The presidential term should be extended to six years and Presidents should be ineligible for reelection. The results, I am confident, would be a higher standard of public service and a greater devotion to the interests of the people.

"The experience of France, which makes the presidential term seven years, has, in the main, proved highly successful."

[From Leslie's Weekly, New York City.]

The actual advantages of a single six-year presidential term overshadow the possible dangers of the change. The suggestion is made that if the electors made a colossal blunder in their choice the country might have a despot saddled upon it for six long years, whereas at present the most unsatisfactory President would not have to be endured longer than four years. If so disposed, a President might inflict incalculable damage upon the country; yet upon the Chief Executive, as upon every other official or department of the Government, there are certain constitutional checks, and as a last recourse a President, for good and sufficient cause, may at any time be impeached during his term of office, whether it be long or short.

In favor of a single long term, without possibility of renomination or reelection, there are decided advantages. Six years is long enough for a President to map out and to carry to successful completion a constructive national policy. Again, the periods of upheaval and unsettling so disastrous to the business interests of the country as a whole will be put two years further apart. Presidential year is always an "off" year. These "off" years should be separated as far as practicable.

Perhaps the greatest advantage of all is that a single term would insure a more fearless and disinterested service from the occupant of the presidential chair. Every President desires a reelection as a mark of approval of his administration, and hardly is he inducted into office before he begins to lay plans to secure another nomination. Though every move he makes may be perfectly honorable, his usefulness to the country as a whole is, in a measure, lessened by this desire for another term. Just as we always expect better results from a President's second term than from his first, so we would expect the best of which he was capable in a single long term.

[From The Tribune, New York City.]

The wide approval given to the suggestion of a single presidential term is gratifying to The Tribune, which is earnestly desirous of seeing an end put to the embarrassments of a situation compelling a President to consider a renomination at the hands of his party as an indispensable indorsement of the merit of his first administration. Many men of prominence in this community have given their support to the single-term movement on the ground that its success would relieve the President of an unenviable obligation to court the favor of politicians in control of the party machinery and leave him free, if the term were extended to six years, to develop his policies with less distracting interference from them and the officeholders and office seekers whom they principally represent.

If a President only served a single term and was ineligible for reelection, it would be much easier to carry through such an admirable plan as that of Mr. Taft for the extension of the classified service so as to cover all postmasters, collectors, registers, surveyors, and other higher grade employees whose offices are now considered legitimate party patronage. A President would have no inducement to select Federal officers with a view of getting their assistance in a campaign for renomination, could choose them for merit only, and insist that they keep out of partisan politics.

The responsibilities of the President have multiplied so rapidly in recent years and the labor thrust upon him is now so enormous that he ought to be allowed to give all his time and energy to the public business, with no thought for the thousand details of the process of paving the way for his own renomination and reelection. Mr. Taft, who has been noted for his neglect to take advantage of political opportunities, has properly complained of the useless strain put upon the President by forcing him to appoint and reappoint thousands of officers who should be selected by the competitive method and put under the protection of the classified service. When the second-term tradition is got rid of the President will be able to devote himself completely to his official duties and become more than ever a constructive force in administration and legislation and the leader not only of his own party but of the voters, without regard to party. Freed from the shackles of partisanship, he can become the President of all parties and all sections, as the framers of the Constitution wisely intended him to be.

Opposition to a single term is nowhere active and aggressive, and the adoption of a one-term amendment can be delayed only by lack of initiative and the too-prevalent disposition to think that the Constitution can be and should be amended only in times of stress and disturbances. It can be changed just as easily in an era of tranquillity, and all that is necessary to get the reform under way is to force action in Congress on a resolution which has already been reported favorably in each House.

Prominent men who have expressed opinions favoring a six-year term, with ineligibility for reelection, as advocated by the Tribune, are:

Silas W. Burt, president of the Civil Service Reform Association; Frederick W. Whitredge, receiver of the Third Avenue Railway; Frederic R. Coudert, the lawyer; George M. Miller, president of St. Luke's Hospital; William Nelson Cromwell, the lawyer; Otto Bannard, the banker; Paul M. Warburg, of Kuhn, Loeb & Co.; William R. Wilcox, chairman of the Public Service Commission; Samuel H. Ordway, president of the Civil Service Reform League; William Jay Schieffelin, president of the Citizens' Union; Benjamin F. Tracy, of the Manhattan Life Insurance Co.; J. Hampden Dougherty, the lawyer; Charles H. Strong, president of the City Club; Adolph Lewisohn, president of the General Development Co.; Eugene A. Philbin, formerly district attorney of New York County; Hugh Hastings, former State historian; Charles J. Peabody, of Brooklyn; Welding Ring, former president of the Produce Exchange; Edward Lauterbach, former member of the board of regents; and Henry R. Towne, president of the Merchants' Association.

The joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for a single term of six years for President, which is to come before the House of Representatives and the United States Senate on the reassembling of those bodies, is known as the Clayton resolution, being named after Representative HENRY D. CLAYTON, of Alabama, and reads:

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during a term of six years; and no person who has held the office by election, or who has acted as President under the Constitution or any law made in pursuance thereof, shall ever again be eligible to hold said office."

The resolution includes the Vice President.

[From the Press, Utica, N. Y.]

Naturally enough there is a renewal of the discussion of the six-year one-term proposition. Now, as always before, there has seemed to be more arguments for than against it. Until human nature can be very materially changed, that seems to be the best possible solution of what is otherwise bound to be a perplexing problem. It is not at all liable that any man would be elected President of the United States who was unworthy or unable satisfactorily to complete a six-year term. In fact, the last four would probably be better than the first two years, for experience is worth a great deal, especially in an office of this kind, and that is one of the arguments advanced in favor of a second term. Under the present system the man who fails to be renominated is looked upon as having been discarded by his party, and the man who, being renominated, fails of reelection is looked upon as having been discarded by the whole people. Accordingly renomination and reelection are considered essential to a satisfactory reputation and standing in history.

In order to get the renomination there is an irresistible temptation to do certain things and leave certain things undone for the express purpose of getting votes or to acquire personal popularity. There is only one standard by which a President ought to judge every question which comes before him, and that is as to whether it is right and best for the general welfare. If he considers his own or his party's interest in that connection he is doing the people an injustice. Many a man has had a good appointment under a President for no other reason than that it would strengthen the Executive in this or that State.

The public service has been the loser by that operation. When a man knows that he will not be eligible for renomination he will endeavor to make the best possible record for himself, and indeed will be determined to do it. Knowing that doing right will not lose him a delegate he will have no temptation to do anything else. His chief end, aim, and ambition will be to make an honorable record, which will deserve and have an honorable place for all time in American history. That is as it ought to be and of itself constitutes a reason.

[From the Plain Dealer, Cleveland, Ohio.]

A resolution providing for a constitutional amendment to change the presidential term from four to six years and to make the President ineligible for reelection will soon come up for action in the Senate.

Only one argument approaching validity has been urged against the amendment. This is that the spread of popular-preference presidential primaries throughout the Union will largely do away with the evils incident to a presidential campaign for renomination and reelection.

To some extent this contention is correct. The shameless use of patronage which has been customary will be of no avail in future preconvention campaign if the popular primary plan is generally adopted. The steam roller can roll conventions flat, but it can not crush the expression of popular sentiment. If popular preference is to become the accepted plan of presidential nomination a large part of the evil of the campaign for a second term will be eliminated.

Enough will remain, however, to make desirable the enactment of the single-term amendment. Even though a President is not busily engaged in oiling the patronage steam roller he will have his eyes constantly fixed on the second-term goal. He will be tempted to shape his policies to catch the popular fancy, regardless of his own convictions. He can not forget the popular primary any more than he can the balloting in November. He will be working first for popularity within his party and afterwards for popularity in the Nation.

A President who spends much effort to gain popular adulation is not likely to be the most useful executive. A President who assumes office with a six-year term ahead of him and with no possibility of reelection may proceed to give the Nation the best there is in him without fear and without favor.

Popular-preference primaries will go far toward nullifying the utility of the patronage steam roller. The single-term amendment will remove the President from the temptation of playing partisan politics. Both are desirable. Neither should be put aside because the other seems likely of enforcement.

[From the Dispatch, Columbus, Ohio.]

The single-term idea is not directed against any man or party. There is nothing "political" in it in the ordinary and superficial sense of the word. It is inspired by the higher and purer conceptions of government and service.

Those who favor a single term of proper length—six or perhaps even eight years—do so because they wish to insure single-minded devotion to good government at all times in the White House, because they wish to remove temptation and pressure, to enable the President to deal with measures, issues, and men strictly on their merits.

Properly presented and explained the advanced single-term idea can not fail to commend itself to progressive and sober-minded citizens.

[From The Journal, Columbus, Ohio.]

In both Houses of Congress the resolution to amend the Constitution by making the presidential term six years and no more has been indorsed by both Judiciary Committees. Now, the matter ought to be pushed to a vote and settled. There is no doubt the people favor the one-term idea. It is hardly a proposition to be argued.

Glorious for the Nation would it be if a President should be elected only every six years. And great would the presidency be if it did not have to think of a reelection.

[From The Journal, Hamilton, Ohio.]

That single term of six years for President has great possibilities. Therefore it is going to win by constitutional amendment.

[From The Sun, Springfield, Ohio.]

President Taft embraced a popular cause when he declared for a six-year term for the President of the United States and a legal bar to reelection. This will do away with much of the uncertainty in national affairs just previous to the national conventions, and will undoubtedly make for better results in the Executive office.

Under the present system the last year of every presidential term where the President is a candidate for the renomination and reelection is given over to political activities rather than to the duties of the office. The President's mind is taken up with schemes to further his own political ambitions. His subordinates dependent upon their chief retaining his place to hold their positions also give of their time to building up party fences. The holders of the many appointive places in the Federal service also are on the alert to serve the prevailing party and are unable to give the proper attention to their routine work.

The official business of the Nation is neglected for a period of almost a year preceding every national election. Following the election comes a period of readjustment, especially if the rival party has prevailed and new incumbents are appointed to the places.

In the days just preceding the election it is impossible to secure beneficial legislation. Everything is tainted with politics. The party in power refuses to pass any measure which is not available for campaign purposes, and the opposition steadfastly opposes any good measure for fear that it may be used in support of the plans of the rival party.

This condition is unsatisfactory. It seems that the people are entitled to have faithful, impartial service from the men they have elevated to office and for whose salaries a good percentage of the taxes is required. Yet, from the very nature of the present system, it is impossible to receive but a minor part of the efforts of the first termers during the preelection year.

In his speech Saturday night, President Taft has pointed one way of ending the present conditions. A six-year term, without possibility of reelection, would give the administration five years to work after the first year of readjustment. It would be possible for the President and his subordinates to expend their energy in making a record for efficiency rather than for expert political moves. With the heads of the departments demanding efficiency rather than political service the work of the men holding subordinate places would be correspondingly improved. The natural tendency of the inferiors would be to hold onto their places through good work rather than hazard their positions in the hope of securing a better under the next administration.

Four years is too short a time for the great national policies to be worked out. The work would be scarcely under way before another administration would begin; but under the six-year term it would be possible to carry out a consistent policy to a successful termination. Many bits of good legislation have been prevented because the term of the legislators ended before they had reached a vote, and a new party, with new policies, effectually prevented any attempt to pass it.

The new system is gaining in favor with all parties. Various public men have from time to time advocated the establishment of a six-year term for Presidents, and it would not be surprising if some action was taken to lengthen the term of the President following Wilson.

[From the Courier, Zanesville, Ohio.]

If the Constitution is amended to limit the tenure of the presidential chair to one term of six years, the office will be placed where it ought to be—above the plane of politics—and its incumbent will be free to act without personal fear of the political consequences. President Taft favors the idea and President Elect Wilson has so expressed himself in the past. The people, we believe, would indorse the proposition if given the opportunity.

[From the Oregonian, Portland, Oreg.]

To forbid reelection of a President implies no distrust of the people beyond that which the people have of themselves. The whole Constitution is a body of limitations, placed by the people themselves on the exercise of their undisputed power. This would be but an added limitation adopted by the people of their own free will.

The danger to the national interests through a change of Presidents in a time of crisis such as existed during the Civil War is too remote to be a serious factor. The people can be relied upon to elect a new President who will carry on those policies of a retiring President which they approve.

The people need fewer elections and their public servants need to be freed from the disturbing influence of frequent campaigns. With a six-year term and with ineligibility we should have longer periods of calm, better service, more continuity of policy, and wider interest in elections when they do come.

[From the Gazette, Altoona, Pa.]

The single six-year term would emancipate the President and increase his power and prestige. He would and could sign or veto bills without thinking of "votes," and the pressure of spoilsmen and practical politicians would be largely removed; self-respect, firmness, dignity, conscientious devotion to duty would be immensely strengthened and exalted by the change.

[From the American, Mahanoy City, Pa.]

President Taft was not the first citizen to advocate the amendment of the Federal Contitution so as to extend the presidential term from four to six years, making the occupant of the office ineligible for reelection. Others have spoken in favor of such a change, and a good many thoughtful citizens favor it.

They are opposed to the quadrennial agitation of the country hitherto inevitable to a national campaign. They think it injures business and gives Americans a bad reputation among their cousins on the other side of the seas. And then it is generally believed that freedom from ambition to succeed himself would enable a President to serve his country better than would be the case if he were moved by a desire to be his own successor.

The ordinary public officer who is eligible to succeed himself is likely to keep an eye on his chances and to move with a caution born of ambition. We suspect a one-term President generally would be more efficient than one who spent much time scheming to succeed himself.

[From the Press, Philadelphia, Pa.]

Whatever else the Congress in its expiring session shall do or leave undone, the resolution pending in the Senate looking to the adoption of an amendment to the Federal Constitution, providing for the extension of the presidential term to six years and making the incumbent ineligible for reelection ought to be favorably acted upon. There is no question such an amendment would be adopted by every State in the Union. It would greatly add to the efficiency and independence of the President if his conduct in office were unbiased by any consideration other than the advancement of the public interest. It would end at once and for good both second and third term demagogy, with the implied drift toward one-man power and an abandonment of representative government. The danger of prolonging the incumbency of an unfit or dangerous man, who should be chosen to the Presidency through extension of the term of office, is sufficiently guarded against by the reservation of the power of impeachment in case of need.

[From the Evening Telegraph, Philadelphia, Pa.]

To lengthen the presidential term to six years and limit it to a single period meets with our hearty approval. The question should no longer be left to the flexible interpretation of mere unwritten precedents, but a definite settlement of it should be incorporated in the Constitution in the form of a necessary and legal amendment. The lengthening and limiting of the term would give any ambitious President a long enough time to shape his policies and test them by experience, and would remove the temptation from such to ask for a second term on a specious plea and secure it by a questionable use of Executive patronage.

[From the Dispatch, York, Pa.]

Contrary to a very general impression, the proposal to limit the presidential tenure to a single term is not new. At the very beginning of the Republic, when the great statesmen of that period were struggling with the mighty problems before them, the matter of the presidential term was a much-discussed and vexing theme. All sorts of suggestions were offered, ranging from life tenure to a single term of four years. When it was finally decided to make the presidential term four years, with eligibility for reelection, a single vote in the convention was the determining factor.

The great advantage to the country in limiting the presidential tenure to a single term of six years would be the enabling of the President to devote all his time to his official duties. Every President would know that he had but one term in which to perfect his policies and carry them out, and he would not be distracted from his purpose by the necessity of laying plans for reelection almost from the day of his inauguration. Each President would have the courage to do what he believed was right, unembarrassed by the threats of his enemies that they would "beat him for reelection." A President would be in large measure exempt from the attacks of his enemies within the party, and at the expiration of his term he would retire to private life with indifference as to whether or not he had played the political game to the satisfaction of the politicians.

[From the Gazette, York, Pa.]

The question of a single term for President of the United States is certain to be discussed exhaustively, if not exhaustingly, in the next few years. By its platform the Democratic Party is bound to take action in that direction, and in doing so it will be indorsed by a majority of the citizens of all parties. The phase of this question about which there is going to be the most debate is what the length of the term should be. There have been some who argued that it should be eight years. Now, however, it is generally conceded that this would be too long. Six years or four years seem to be the popular limits.

Those who argue in favor of the shorter term say that four years are plenty long enough for a good man and that six years would be altogether too long for a poor man to occupy the presidential chair. All of this latter part of the contention may be granted. But would not even two years be too long for an unfit President? It was the original intention of the founders of the Government to have short terms. Jefferson in a letter quotes that maxim of that day as being "Where annual election ends, tyranny begins." That, of course, would be a practical application of genuine democracy, the theory of government not necessarily the policy of the Democratic Party, but it will be granted by all that our country is too large for it to work out successfully. Massachusetts elects State officers annually, and even in that small State the frequency of the important elections is becoming burdensome.

So that it is plain we must look for some other way out of the difficulty. It is clear that the annual election of President is out of the question, and the eight-year term would be too long. It is true that six years would be too long for an unfit President, and so would four years. It seems, then, that the best way to settle the matter is to make sure of the right man and the right platform, and then give him time enough to thoroughly try out the policies for which he stands. If this is done, there can be little valid objection to a six-year term, and there can be little question that this is none too long to work out important policies.

Another thing should be borne in mind—the people are beginning to weary of the frequent and strenuous campaigns. There is danger that this may result in such an increasing indifference that it will be easier than it now is for incompetent and even dangerous men to be "put over" by scheming interests who look upon "practical" politics as a part of their business game. This must be reckoned with. Less frequent elections and a more thorough stirring up of interest in the campaigns seems the best solution.

Furthermore, it would be a great gain if this could be so arranged that the State elections could be held during those years when there were no national elections. Suppose, for example, that our Presidents were elected every six years and the Members of the Lower House of Congress every three years, so that a congressional election would come in the middle of the presidential term, as now. That would give all the States ample opportunity to arrange their elections at times when there would be no complications with national problems. Would not this result in better government all around? We believe it would.

[From the Commercial Appeal, Memphis, Tenn.]

There is a growing inclination on the part of the public toward the six-year term. There are sensible reasons why such a term should be established instead of the brief four years now allotted to the President.

Everyone will admit that nothing so disturbs the commercial welfare of the country as an election. From ocean to ocean the States have been disturbed for the past two months, and will be until November.

A political campaign, even over a local issue, disturbs business. Brothers turn against brothers, fathers against their sons, over politics. The real truth is that we have too much of this sort of thing, and if it is not a presidential campaign it is another, with its turmoil and excitement.

Each President elected has entered office with the determination to do the best he could for the country. We have had no bad men in office. Our Presidents, irrespective of party, have been men of class. They have lived up to the platforms upon which they were elected as far as possible. No President has ever been associated with any graft scheme, and all have been practically free from the taint of scandal. It stands to reason that only men of the highest character present themselves for such an exalted office. Men of the highest character are elected, and the country has prospered under every President we have had since the days of George Washington.

It is safe to trust anyone who can secure the indorsement of the people, and if he is elected for six or eight years instead of four, so much the better. As it is, scarcely does a President get comfortably seated in office than it is necessary to run again. This keeps the country upset. No one can rest easily during a campaign. It is more uncertain in some States than in others. There is always an element of uncertainty in a campaign. No one can say what the outcome will be or what the effect on the country will be. Wall Street holds the balance of power. It can create a panic or quell one. Wall Street is always uneasy during a campaign, and while the street is uneasy so is the country.

With fewer elections the country would be better off, and with a longer presidential term there would be a smaller opportunity for strife and unsettled business conditions.

[From the News, Wheeling, W. Va.]

From all indications an attempt will be made at the next session of Congress to change the tenure of office for the President of the United States from a term of four years to a single term of six years.

The change will necessitate an amendment to the Constitution, and will entail no little inconvenience. However, it seems to be a good idea.

At present the length of a presidential term is four years. A man may succeed himself as many times as he is able to secure the nomination and election, although custom makes it bad form to ask for another after one has served two terms.

A man is elected for a term of four years. During this time all of his actions are usually directed so that he will be able to secure a second nomination and election. His actions are "a play to the galleries," as it were. During his first term his time is so taken up by this "gallery play" that he is likely to neglect many of his duties and act contrary to the way he would act if his tenure were restricted to a single term.

During this term the members of the Cabinet, who owe their office to appointment from the Executive, play politics along with their chief. At the end of the first four years there is a possibility of defeat for the candidate for reelection.

If the tenure of office were made a single term of six years, the administration would undoubtedly be made more efficient. The time would be long enough to give a good Executive an opportunity to put into effect his policies and not long enough to permit an incapable Executive to harm the country.

The change is a good one. Think it over.

[From the Intelligencer, Wheeling, W. Va.]

Presidential elections come too often, and Presidents too frequently play politics. A four-year term hardly enables a President to institute and carry through an established line of policy, and eligibility for reelection tempts him to try to secure reelection. As a rule, the first two years of a President's administration are given up to getting acquainted with his job, and the second two years are filled with efforts to secure another term. Lengthening the President's term and forbidding reelection would place the office of the Presidency on a higher plane and insure a higher grade of public service.

[From the Chicago Evening Post, Tuesday, Oct. 25, 1904.]

REVELL FOR SIX YEARS—CHICAGO MAN URGES THAT THE TERM OF PRESIDENT SHOULD BE LIMITED—TELLING POINTS ARE MADE—SPEECH GIVEN AT OPENING OF COMMERCIAL CONGRESS AT ST. LOUIS.

ST. LOUIS, October 25.

The opening session of the Trans-Mississippi Commercial Congress was held here to-day in Convention Hall at the World's Fair. The congress will continue the remainder of the work.

Alexander H. Revell, of Chicago, vice president of the National Business League, delivered an address on the question of a single six-year term for President of the United States.

The feature of the opening session was the large attendance of visitors, showing the general interest in the proceedings. During the sessions of the congress, which will continue through Saturday, matters of importance to residents of the trans-Mississippi region will be discussed, such as irrigation, good roads, river navigation, and interstate-commerce laws.

Following the invocation by Rev. Michael Burnham, of St. Louis, the meeting was called to order by the chairman of the executive committee, Thomas Richardson, of Portland, Oreg. In a short introductory address, Mr. Richardson presented the president of the congress, R. C. Kerens, of St. Louis.

ADDRESS OF MR. REVELL.

Mr. Revell spoke as follows:

"The National Business League has started a movement to secure an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which will fix the term of office of the President at six years instead of four years. At the same time, and by the same amendment, it is proposed to make the President ineligible to reelection.

"I am not aware that anyone questions the expediency of the proposed change. Indeed, so far as I can learn, all admit that the changes proposed would be sound public policy. It is perhaps true that those who are engaged in politics for diversion or for profit may be lukewarm in the effort to prolong the period between elections. But it is not likely that the politician—the man who is trying to be politic and responsive to public demands—will interpose to prevent an admittedly needed and popular amendment.

"All things considered it may be accepted that the sentiment of the country is such that the amendment may be secured upon the presentation of the proper arguments to the electors and those who as officials may be instrumentalities in bringing it about. The labor that is before us consists in pulling together and putting in order the half-formulated latent sentiment in regard to the proposed amendment. It is this labor which the National Business League has undertaken to perform. It is to this endeavor that all right-minded electors are expected to extend courageous and industrious assistance.

"No reasonable objection can be raised against the lengthening of the President's term of office.

"As things now are there is, in fact, only about three years of settled conditions, and many would acknowledge only two years. The fourth year is given up to the campaign. In fact, it is only during the first two years of the presidential term that business, and that word does not mean the great capitalists only, can feel that conditions are settled. Along toward the end of the term the policy which the President has pursued is used by the opposition on which to unite in order to create an 'issue' for the oncoming campaign. The effect of all this is that business becomes more or less gambling against the chances of the presidential succession.

"LOOK TO THE GOVERNMENT.

"There is a growing tendency in this, and indeed in all countries, to look upon the government or the administration as the cause of the prosperity or adversity of the people. This tendency disposes the people to look more and more to the government as the author of their conditions. Demagogues, selfishly and ignorantly finding this tendency to exist, endeavor from time to time to arouse the voter into active hostility against the administration. He endeavors to convince his too easily persuaded auditors that a change of administration policy, especially in relation to the currency or the tariff, we will say, will change their fortunes from bad to good.

"The effect of this is that during any presidential term and under any policy which may be put into practice there are those who are disposed to find fault with it and to create an impression that exactly the opposite policy would be more in the interest of the general public. At times this sort of criticism results in the formation of parties predicated on propositions to squarely reverse the policy which is being put into practice by the sitting President and to put into operation an entirely opposite policy.

"The effect of this condition of things is to present to the business man a situation in which two distinctly opposite policies are proposed. He can make no calculations for the future, and he must hold in abeyance many of his enterprises and curtail his business until he finds out what is going to be done—what the result of the election will be.

"This condition of suspense operates to depress business and intensify adverse conditions, or at least to modify the benefits of the administrative policy which may be in practice at the time. The element of unwarranted doubt operates to bring about changes of policies and Presidents, changes that are in themselves unwarranted and possibly harmful.

"NOT FAIR TO JUDGE BY.

"This presidential year is hardly a fair one to judge by. It is the most prosperous presidential year in 44 years, and perhaps for a longer period. This would hardly be the time or place, and it is not essential that we discuss all the reasons for this. While the year has been phenomenal as an election year, and with the splendid agricultural and financial situation, still there has been a pronounced timidity among business men in regard to inaugurating new business enterprises.

"Also there has been and is very general complaint, especially in manufacturing industries. Hence, the question naturally arises, Would not the year 1904 have been a record-breaking year had there been no presidential election?

"A longer term for the President would not only create a longer period of business security, but it would give ampler time for a President to formulate and carry out his policies. Very often presidential administrative plans can not be put into operation and the benefits of them realized by the general public before the time for another campaign approaches. In other words, the presidential term of four years is too brief for a President to inaugurate and carry out a policy. A six-year term would give ampler time.

"Another thing, the election of a President for six years would have a tendency to silence those agitators who preach discontent and advise the people to look forward to the next presidential election as the time when they could make a change which would repair their grievances. Six years would be too long to look ahead. With a six-year term the country would settle down to calmness and steadiness in business, which is unknown under the present four-year term.

"By making the President ineligible to succeed himself he would be enabled to leave politics behind when he took the oath of office. He could direct his efforts to being a good President. The record of a President would then merit careful comparison.

"By gradual growth it has come to be an unwritten law that a President is expected to succeed himself. It is expected that his second election will be a 'vindication' of his first term of office. There is no question about this fact. For a President to decline to be a candidate for reelection after having served a four-year term would be taken to mean that he believed that he could not be reelected.

"In other words, a failure to demand renomination would be accepted as a confession of the failure of him and his party to properly administer the Government.

"Thus it is incumbent on a President at the end of his term to again become a candidate for reelection even if he does not want to, and, in a measure, his party must renominate him even if he did not want renomination. As a mater of fact, this condition of things has practically established that the presidential service of a man is eight years.

"MUST KEEP IN FAVOR.

"This fact that the President must secure renomination and reelection compels him so to conduct and warp his administrative policies that he will remain in favor with the politicians who are to renominate him and also to cater to the more transient popular sentiment. No President since Washington that we know of has ever acted differently. No man, as mankind goes, can be expected to be at his best under such condition of things. He may fairly be expected to be at his worst. Poor human nature is not such that Presidents may be expected to crucify themselves for the unappreciated welfare of their supporters.

"Representative Gaines, of Tennessee, has been making a historical study of the question of one term for Presidents, and points out that it was a live question with the convention that framed the Constitution and has been under discussion a good part of the time since.

"One of the greatest curses of American politics is the spoils system. By means of their appointive power, from President down to coroner, with a few exceptions, public officials aspire to succeed themselves, and as soon as they are elected utilize the patronage of office in order to pay for favors rendered in the past and expected to be obtained in the future. A President who was not by custom expected to secure a 'vindication' by reelection would not be under compulsion to use his appointive power in order to make himself secure against the next nomination and election. In short, the one-term principle would tend, as nothing else would tend, to eradicate the spoils system.

"Now, then, what is to be done? The Constitution of the United States says concerning the term of the President: 'He shall hold his office during the term of four years.' In relation to the matter of amendments the Constitution says:

"'The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution; or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for the purpose of proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures, three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress.'

"TO APPEAL TO CONGRESS.

"From this it will be seen that either the State legislatures or Congress may initiate the proposition to amend the Constitution. The practice generally has been for Congress to propose and submit amendments to the several State legislatures. The same course will be pursued in this case, and Congress will be asked to propose an amendment making the presidential term to be six years and the President ineligible to reelection.

"The endeavor of the National Business League will be to make it apparent to the Senators and Representatives in Congress that the people actually desire that the proposed amendment be submitted to the legislatures. If this fact can be demonstrated, there is no doubt that Congress will hasten to comply with the demands of the public. Ratification in the State legislatures will be brought about by the same means. The responsiveness of our legislative bodies to the demands of business interests are always prompt and satisfactory.

"More and more the welfare of all the people is becoming and is understood to be wrapped up in and dependent upon business prosperity. To make it manifest, therefore, that the business men of the country believe and demand a presidential term of six years and no renomination of Presidents will be to assure the adoption of the amendment. The arousal of the business interests of the country, it will be seen, is the real, actual labor that is before the business league. Those who have undertaken to propagate the amendment proposition should see to it that those under them, those connected with them in business, their club fellows, their friends and customers, are fully advised of the amendment and its expected good results."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHILTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 8188) to amend section 113 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911, reported it without amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 27475) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report (No. 1164) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, submitted a report (No. 1168), accompanied by a bill (S. 8314) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, the bill being a substitute for the following Senate bills heretofore referred to that committee:

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4241) to encourage rifle practice and promote a patriotic spirit among the citizens and youth of the United States, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1165) thereon.

Mr. GAMBLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 110) to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in Todd and Bennett Counties, in the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1166) thereon.

YOSEMITE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. WORKS. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 8279) to amend an act approved October 1, 1890, entitled "An act to set apart certain tracts of land in the State of California as forest reservations," and I submit a report (No. 1163) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOLDIERS' HOME AT SANTA MONICA, CAL.

Mr. JONES. Under Senate resolution 160 the Committee on Military Affairs or a subcommittee thereof was directed to make an investigation of the management of the Branch National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and Sailors at Santa Monica, Cal. A subcommittee was appointed in pursuance of the resolution and made the investigation and submitted its findings and recommendations.

By direction of the full committee I submit the report of the subcommittee (Rept. No. 1167), together with a bill to transfer the Pacific Branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to the War Department, recommended by it. In doing so, I will state that the bill is reported with the recommendation of the subcommittee for such action and consideration as the Senate may desire to take upon it, and it is not to be understood as being recommended by the full Committee on Military Affairs. I ask that the bill be placed on the calendar.

The bill (S. 8297) to transfer the Pacific Branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to the War Department was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take the liberty of inquiring of the Senator from Washington whether the bill should not be referred to the committee.

Mr. JONES. The resolution directed the committee or a subcommittee to report the facts and their findings to the Senate. Under the peculiar language of the resolution, I think the bill should go to the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SANDERS:

A bill (S. 8298) to provide for the enlargement of the Federal building at Chattanooga, Tenn.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 8299) to amend section 9 of the act entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," approved March 1, 1911.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To what committee does the Senator from Tennessee desire to have the bill referred?

Mr. SANDERS. The Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is disposed to refer it to the Committee on Conservation of National Resources.

Mr. SANDERS. It is really a water-power bill. I think it should go to the Committee on Commerce, but I am not sure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CLARK of Wyoming:

A bill (S. 8300) to provide for the admission in evidence of certificates of the heads of executive departments and independent executive establishments to show the nonemployment of persons brought to trial under section 32 of the act of March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. OLIVER:

A bill (S. 8301) granting an increase of pension to Mary F. Nichols (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 8302) to provide for the erection of a public building at Naugatuck, Conn.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 8303) granting an increase of pension to Sarah L. Bentley (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GRONNA:

A bill (S. 8304) for the relief of Rodger Capiette; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. JACKSON:

A bill (S. 8305) to promote and encourage the building of modern public highways by granting aid thereto under certain conditions; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 8306) to amend an act entitled "An act to require the erection of fire escapes in certain buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 19, 1906, as amended by the act approved March 2, 1907; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 8307) granting an increase of pension to Martha J. Strayer (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MARTIN of Virginia:

A bill (S. 8308) granting a pension to Joseph H. Mayo (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 8309) granting an increase of pension to George W. Brown (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 8310) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River opposite the town of Newport, Wash.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

A bill (S. 8311) providing for a monument to commemorate the services and sacrifices of the women of the country at the time of the American Revolution (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. BANKHEAD:

A bill (S. 8312) for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at the city of Union Springs, Ala.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. CHILTON:

A bill (S. 8313) to provide for the erection of a public building at Williamson, W. Va.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. McLEAN submitted an amendment providing for a survey to secure the increased depth of the harbor at Stamford, Conn., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States $10,000 on deposit to the credit of the Creek Indians and pay it to the trustees of the Henry Kendall College, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make a per capita payment of $200 from the tribal trust funds of the Seminole Indians to each individual officially enrolled as a member of that tribe, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also (for Mr. CHAMBERLAIN) submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 for improving the Willamette River, Oreg., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. O'GORMAN submitted an amendment providing for the purchase of subsistence supplies for all vessels in harbor-boat service not otherwise provided for, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $20,000 for the erection and completion of a hospital building and equipment at Pima Agency, Ariz., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $60,000 for the purchase of not less than 600 acres of land convenient to the city of Washington, D. C., to be used for target-practice purposes, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RICHARDSON submitted an amendment providing for a survey of the Leipsic River, Del., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

CONNECTICUT RIVER DAM.

Mr. JONES. I submit an amendment, intended to be proposed by me, to the bill (S. 8033) to authorize the Connecticut River Co. to relocate and construct a dam across the Connecticut River, and so forth. I ask that it be read and lie on the table.

The proposed amendment was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. JONES to the bill (S. 8033) to authorize the Connecticut River Co. to relocate and construct a dam across the Connecticut River above the village of Windsor Locks, in the State of Connecticut, viz: Strike out all of section 1 after the words "And provided further," in line 19, page 2, and insert the following:

"The assent of Congress herein given shall not be complete and operative until there shall be filed with the Secretary of War an agreement signed by the said Connecticut River Co. and the proper authorities of the State of Connecticut in which is recognized and acknowledged the full authority of the State of Connecticut to supervise, regulate, and control the rates to be charged by said company, its successors and assigns, for the energy developed; and the right of said State from time to time to readjust such rates; and the right of said State to supervise, regulate, and control said corporation, its successors or assigns, its management, stocks, bonds, or evidences of indebtedness in such manner as may be provided from time to time by the laws of said State; and the right of said State to exact from said corporation, its successors or assigns, such annual charges as may be just and reasonable, taking into account the amount spent and required to be spent by said corporation in improving the navigation of said river and the right of said corporation to a reasonable return on the fair value of such dam and appurtenances, works and property, allowing for the cost of construction, maintenance, and renewal.

PUNISHMENT OF MURDER IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 39), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return the bill (S. 7162) to amend section 801 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

HARBOR REGULATIONS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1072) to amend section 895 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, which were, on page 2, line 10, to strike out "ice, snow," and insert "or," and on page 2, line 10, to strike out ", or trash."

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 23039. An act to legalize titles in the District of Columbia to certain citizens was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

H. R. 28180. An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR DAVIS.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent to dispose of a merely formal matter, Senate resolution 425, authorizing the Secretary of the Senate to pay the actual expenses incurred by the committee attending the funeral of the late Senator JEFF DAVIS. It will take only the time to read it.

There being no objection, the resolution was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the President of the Senate pro tempore in arranging for and attending the funeral of the late Senator JEFF DAVIS, from the State of Arkansas, vouchers for the same to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

CONTRIBUTIONS FOR CAMPAIGN PURPOSES.

Mr. JONES. I ask the Senate to consider Senate resolution 418, amending Senate resolution 79, in regard to the investigation of campaign contributions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution named by him.

The resolution was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That Senate resolution 79, agreed to August 26, 1912, be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting, on line 2, page 2, of said resolution, after the word "eight," the words "November 5, 1912."

PROPOSED EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As a substitute for that motion, I move that the Senate proceed with the consideration of House bill 22871, to establish extension departments in connection with agricultural colleges.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not in order under the rule. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas and Mr. SMITH of Georgia called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when Mr. BACON's name was called). I desire to state that the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is detained at home by sickness in his family.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MASSEY]. I desire this announcement to stand on each vote for the day. I vote "yea."

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. FOSTER's name was called). I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER] on account of illness in his family, and ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. GARDNER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. I desire to transfer that pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM]. He seems not to have voted. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. RICHARDSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and vote. I vote "yea." I make this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably absent from the city. I desire this statement to stand for the day.

Mr. KERN (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). I announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] on account of illness.

While I am on my feet I desire to transfer my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], instead of to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], as previously announced.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LIPPITT. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SANDERS. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA].

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], with whom I am paired, has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina has not voted.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Then I will withdraw my vote, having a general pair with that Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE], who is absent from the Chamber. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. OWEN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (after having voted in the negative). I desire to inquire if the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that Senator has not voted.

Mr. CULBERSON. As I have a general pair with him, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (after having voted in the negative). I voted upon entering the Chamber just now, but I am informed that a pair had previously been transferred to me. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a moment ago I announced my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and transferred it to the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], who was not then present. I wish now to withdraw the transfer, so as to give the Senator from Maine an opportunity to vote, and also to withdraw my vote, and to stand paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Under that statement I vote "nay."

Mr. STEPHENSON entered the Chamber, and voted in the affirmative.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], to whom I transferred my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], having voted, I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ask that the vote be again recapitulated, there having been several changes.

The Secretary recapitulated the vote.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to inquire if the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is paired?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no information on the subject.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Chair could probably secure it from the Secretary.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is paired with me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon, it has just been stated, is paired.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, a Senator sitting by me suggests that the name of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] was called on the roll call. Is that a fact.

Mr. OLIVER. My name was called on the roll call, but I transferred my pair with the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] to the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and voted.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER].

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—31.

Brandegee	Cummins	McCumber	Sanders

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 22871, known as the agricultural extension departments bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 22871) to establish agricultural extension departments in connection with agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senate that it is exceedingly important to act to-day upon this bill, together with the amendments thereto. To-morrow we take up the constitutional amendment under unanimous consent, and following that the bill of the Senator from Vermont (S. 3) would come up as an original proposition. The friends of that measure well understand that if it should be passed independently of the House measure it would go to the House, would be referred to a committee, and there would be practically no chance to pass any part of it at this session of Congress. On the other hand, if we add to the House bill such portions of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont as we have perfected, the amendments would go at once to the House with the House bill, and necessarily would receive consideration. The House might decline to accept them immediately, and then a conference might be necessary. But before the conference committee we would have an opportunity of considering the amendments presented by the Senator from Vermont and adopted by the Senate, and out of this conference we could hope for legislation.

It is therefore exceedingly important to act on this measure to-day, while the House bill is before the Senate, and before Senate bill No. 3—the original bill of the Senator from Vermont—is reached. It will be reached immediately following the consideration of the constitutional amendment by unanimous consent.

I want to suggest to the friends of the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont a few modifications of it. I wish very much that the Senator from Vermont were in his place, in order that we might have his consideration of these suggestions.

Mr. PAGE entered the Chamber.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will take the liberty of repeating, since the return of the Senator from Vermont, what I have just said: It is extremely important, if we are to pass any of the provisions contained in the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, that we should have action to-day, as to-morrow we take up the constitutional amendment under unanimous consent, and immediately following that the original bill of the Senator from Vermont will come up. If we should act upon that original bill, there would be no chance for legislation at this session.

I think it unwise to send to the House, as an amendment to the House bill, all of the provisions presented by the Senator from Vermont. They involve an appropriation of $13,000,000. They involve so much new matter that we could hardly hope to obtain for them thoughtful consideration. Yet if we should take about three of them, instead of all six, and send them to the House, there would not be such a volume of them as to almost deter the mind from undertaking to consider them. If we would take his section 11, making the appropriation to secondary schools that have established distinct industrial or trades departments, and pass it, omitting section 10; if we would take, then, his appropriation to agricultural high schools, and pass it; if we would take his appropriation to normal schools, and pass it, those three simple and distinct propositions sent to the House could be readily brought to the attention of Members of the House, and I think there would be much more hope of accomplishing something.

I have been continuously working upon this matter whenever I have had an opportunity; and I think we could make a few amendments, by eliminating a part of the measure for the present, and pass it. With those eliminations, I am ready to vote for it, and I am ready to help try to pass it through the House.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. PAGE. I shall be very glad, indeed, to have the valuable assistance of the Senator from Georgia in perfecting my bill in any way that seems to be right and best. But, as I look at the matter now, it seems to me that the provisions had better go through substantially as they appear in the original Page bill, so called, and then, out of conference, we may be able to get some results, such as have been suggested by the Senator from Georgia.

I am informed that there will be a little further discussion upon the bill this morning. Meanwhile I will give the matter consideration, and I will see the Senator from Georgia promptly about it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to give to the Senate again, very briefly, my criticisms upon the appropriation contained in section 10.

It is not limited to schools that have industrial departments. It would apply to over 13,000 schools. It would give only about $600 to each school. It undertakes to give instruction in agriculture, in the industries, in the trades, and in household economics. I do not think anyone who has had experience with the effort to introduce industrial and trades training in a high school has failed to find that good work can not be accomplished except where there is a distinct department devoted to the work, with equipment and with appropriation sufficient really to do something.

In the case of the work in the trades and the industries, you require equipment with tools; you require separate rooms for the instruction; you require a man especially trained, who is skilled with his hands, and who also has sufficient mental equipment to give the instruction. You can not put that kind of work into a high school with one or two thousand dollars; and if you tried it, your money would simply be wasted.

The Senator's second provision, No. 11, recognizes the distinction between undertaking to introduce industrial and trades work generally in high schools and undertaking to introduce it only in those which are equipped for it, and it limits the appropriation to schools with a distinct department, where the amount of expenditure will be sufficient to amount to something.

I speak so positively upon this subject because I have seen the experiment tried. For nearly 20 years I was actively connected with the public schools of my own city. We tried the experiment of expending a small sum in each school to try to introduce industrial and trades work. At the end of a couple of years we were compelled to abandon it and to establish a distinct department of industrial and trades work, with a distinct building and with a much larger appropriation. So far as I have been able to learn, practically all educators who have been enlisted in behalf of trades and industrial work give the same report—that the money is wasted when you undertake to add it to a high school without reference to the preparedness of the high school for the work. Not only is it wasted, but it interferes with the regular work of the high school, damaging that which has been already done without introducing any new, substantial work of real value.

Mr. President, I move to strike from the amendment of the Senator from Vermont section 10.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia proposes an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 10.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Georgia has forgotten that section 10 has been already stricken out.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. A substitute for section 10 has been placed in the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. What was formerly section 3 has been substituted for the original section 10.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; that is now section 10.

Mr. CUMMINS. While I am on my feet, I desire to say that there is a great deal of force in what the Senator from Georgia has said. I prefer the old section 3 to section 10, as proposed by the Senator from Vermont, but I would not anticipate great results from either section. While I intend to follow the Senator from Vermont in this matter, frankness compels me to say that I think the value of his bill lies in other provisions in it rather than in section 3.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to say to the Senator that I have made up my mind to support section 11. I am going to support it and vote for it.

Mr. CUMMINS. But of course section 10 has been already stricken out of the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am referring to the substituted section, which is the original section 3. I am seeking to direct the bill to the high school that has an industrial department, as contained in section 11, instead of undertaking to make an appropriation to a high school which has no industrial department. If we could get it, I would put the whole $6,000,000 into section 11 rather than to have three millions of it in section 3 and three millions of it in section 11, because from section 11 we will really get results.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have some objections, however, to the present form of section 11. I agree, however, that little can be done, under the provisions of this bill, in the general high schools of the country. But I do not think the provision should be so severe with regard to those high schools that have a department for instruction in the trades and industries and home economics. But I will refer to that later on.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, if I correctly understand the situation, the provision which the Senator from Georgia seeks to have placed in the bill is the same section that was stricken out on the motion of the Senator from Iowa. The Senate having passed upon that matter affirmatively, I hardly feel as though I could properly consent to a change now, and to a reversal of the action of the Senate, under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understood the effect of the action of the Senate to be to substitute original section 3 for section 10 as the Senator from Vermont brought it in. I did not understand the action of the Senate to be a final determination that it would even retain section 3 as section 10. It was to the consideration of the advisability of concentrating our efforts on section 11, and giving what we give for industrial and trades work to schools where they have a distinct department for such work, that I was addressing myself before the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may I inquire what is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Georgia is to strike out section 10 from the amendment of the Senator from Vermont as amended.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I had not intended to make any observations upon this particular section of the bill. If, however, we are to take for granted everything that has been said here in regard to this particular section, then farming is indeed a limited industry.

I am somewhat surprised to hear Senators say that they are opposed to the provision for vocational education and instruction in the trades and industries and home economics because it would not better the conditions on the farm. Does any Senator mean to say that the farmer has not as much use for a vocational education or special training in the trades and home economics as those engaged in any other industry? The farmer has as much use for the trade of blacksmith or carpenter, or harness maker as any of the persons engaged in those trades in the cities.

I should like to have some of these "farmers" who come from the large cities tell me what work is to be done on a farm. I have not opposed the passage of the so-called House bill. I am not saying now that I intend to oppose the passage of the House bill. But it seems to me that the farmer in the large city is more interested in the passage of this measure than are the real farmers who live on their farms.

Are we expending these millions of dollars merely for the benefit of the farmer? Have we a right to take the money from the Treasury of the United States for the sole purpose of helping the farmer? Is it the belief of any Senator that the provisions of this bill will accomplish that very purpose?

Mr. President, you can not name a single trade embodied in this measure offered by the Senator from Vermont but what the farmer has as much use for it and it is of as much benefit to the farmer as it is for him to take hold of the plow handle and plow the ground.

Farming has indeed become very limited in its scope if nothing more is required of those engaged in it than the mere knowledge of knowing how to handle the shovel and the plow. You tell me that farming is the greatest industry in the world. I say yes; perhaps I ought not to say it, because I am a practical farmer, but I wish to say to you, sir, that the business of farming does not consist of such a limited scope as some would have us to believe. In my judgment the provisions in the bill now offered by the Senator from Vermont would ultimately be of great benefit and a great blessing not only to those engaged in the vocations and trades, but to farmers and to mankind.

Are we to make an appropriation for the farmer to teach him how to hold the plow or how to swing the ax? Do you suppose that that is the only thing to be done on a farm?

Mr. President, I am perhaps as much interested in this measure as any man can be, but I confess I am less enthusiastic over it than are some of the farmers in the big cities. It is not as important to teach the farmer how to produce crops as it is to find him a market for his products or to reduce the cost of production so that his industry will yield him a profit. The State which I have the honor, in part, to represent produced more than 150,000,000 bushels of wheat in 1912. That, sir, is an indication, so far as production is concerned, that the farmer in my State needs no special teaching in that line. I am not objecting, however, to any measure that will aid people in other sections of the country where they have not learned to farm as we have learned it in North Dakota.

Mr. President, to show to the Senate that the statement I have just made should receive some consideration, I wish to quote from the agricultural expert who has just made his first report of what is known as the Better Farming Association of North Dakota. Mr. Thomas P. Cooper, who, I understand, has been employed by the Federal Government, has this to say on that particular point:

> The problems of the agricultural sections of the State are to a great extent economic and social rather than the immediate question of production. Under the systems of farming which have been developed the North Dakota farmer has become expert in the production of the small grains cheaply. Farmers generally are well acquainted with the methods of agriculture which will enable them to produce crops. They are not familiar, however, with the methods of farm management required under other systems of farming or where new crops and live stock are to be used. Much additional knowledge is necessary.
> The fundamental problem, then, consists in arousing action among farmers and the public to such an extent that new systems of farming, new crops, and live stock will be generally adopted. This necessitates the creation of a new sentiment toward our farm lands and toward the farm as a permanent source of wealth and of income. Briefly, the basic agricultural problems confronting the work of this association may be classified as, first, the maintenance of the fertility of the soil, involving new cropping systems and the use of live stock; second, the introduction and general use of new economic crops, such as clovers, alfalfa, winter grains, and cord; third—

And, Mr. President, I think this should have been first—

> Third, the business reorganization of the farm for greater profits.

If you want to help the farmer in his condition, make it possible for him to receive a greater remuneration from what he produces. Will any Senator tell me that if farming were as profitable as other industries we would experience any difficulty in getting more people on the farms? In that respect farming has not been a profitable business.

I wish to quote briefly from a special message of Theodore Roosevelt, sent to the Senate February 9, 1909, upon this subject:

> Yet farming does not yield either the profit or the satisfaction that it ought to yield and may be made to yield.

The special commission appointed to make a report on the condition of country life has this to say:

> (A) STATEMENT OF THE GENERAL FARM PROBLEM.
> The farm labor problem, however, is complicated by several special conditions, such as the fact that the need for labor is not continuous, the lack of conveniences of living for the laborer, long hours, the want of companionship, and in some places the apparently low wages. Because of these conditions the necessary drift of workmen is from the open country to the town. On the part of the employer the problem is complicated by the difficulty of securing labor, even at the relatively high prices now prevailing, that is competent to handle modern farm machinery and to care for live stock and to handle the special work of the improved dairy. It is further complicated in all parts of the country by the competition of railroads, mines, and factories, which, by reason of shorter hours, apparently higher pay, and the opportunities for social diversion and often of dissipation, attract the native farm hand to the towns and cities.
> The difficulty of securing good labor is so great in many parts of the country that farmers are driven to dispose of their farms, leaving their land to be worked on shares by more or less irresponsible tenants, or selling them outright, often to foreigners. All absentee and proxy farming (which seems to be increasing) creates serious social problems in the regions thus affected. There is not sufficient good labor available in the country to enable us to farm our lands under present systems of agriculture and to develop our institutions effectively. Our native labor supply could be much increased by such hygienic measures as would lessen the unnecessary death rate among country children and insure better health to workmen.
> So long as the labor supply is not equal to the demand the country can not compete with the town in securing labor. The country must meet the essential conditions offered by the town or change the kind of farming.
>
> The most marked reaction to the labor difficulty is the change in modes of farm management, whereby farming is slowly adapting itself to the situation. In some cases this change is in the nature of more intensive and businesslike methods whereby the farmer becomes able to secure a better class of labor and to employ it more continuously. More frequently, however, the change is in the nature of a simplification of the business and a less full and active farm life. In the sod regions of the Northeast the tendency is toward a simple or even a primitive nature farming, with the maximum of grazing and meadow and the minimum of hand labor. In many States the more difficult lands are being given up and machinery farming is extending. This results in an unequal development of the country as a whole, with a marked shift in the social equilibrium. The only real solution of the present labor problem must lie in improved methods of farming. These improvements will be forced by the inevitable depletion of soil fertility under any and all one-crop systems in every part of the country, and realized by the adoption on the part of intelligent, progressive farmers of a rotation of crops and a system of husbandry that will enable them to employ their labor by the year and thereby secure a higher type of workman by providing him a home with all its appurtenances. The development of local industries will also contribute to the solution of the problem.
> The excessive hours of labor on farms must be shortened.

Anyone who has had experience in farming will know that farming has not been a profitable business.

But you tell me, sir, that we are going to help the farmer now and show him how he can increase production. Of course, we all welcome the assistance to an education which will help us to grow two blades where one grew before. We are all in favor of teaching the farmer to be able to produce more on the same number of acres than he has produced before. But I want to say that with the intensified farming greater production means an increased cost in farming. It is not because the farmer does not know how to produce larger crops and increase the yield on the farm, but it is because the profit he receives from his farm does not enable him to employ the labor that is necessary to produce that larger yield. It is for that reason and for that reason alone that we are unable to produce as much per acre in the United States as they are producing in foreign countries. We pay higher prices for labor than they do in Europe. We are confronted with the same conditions in the business of farming that other industries of this country have to experience, in that of paying higher wages. During the busy season of the year we have paid for the commonest kind of labor $3.50 to $4 per day.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. GRONNA. With pleasure.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am very much interested in the Senator's suggestion that the farmer is confronted with the same wage problem that the industries are in the industrial centers. Does not the Senator think that it is a much greater problem for the farmer? Does he not have to pay much higher wages in proportion than are paid in the industries, because of the inclination of European immigrants to go to cities and not to go to the country?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I think that is true, although I do not want anyone to take my judgment on that. I only know what we have to pay on the farm. I do not know what has to be paid by other industries.

Mr. ROOT. May I ask a question of the Senator?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GRONNA. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. ROOT. I do not know whether it is a fact in the Senator's part of the country, but it is in mine, that the one trouble about the wage question with the farmer is that there is a very short period during the year, under our method of conducting a farm, during which a large amount of help is needed. It is very difficult to get help where you can employ a man only a couple of months; it is only the chance, floating fellow that you can pick up. Where you can give a man but two months' employment or three months' employment during the year, and nothing for nine months, of course you have a much smaller supply and poorer material, and you have to pay higher wages.

It has seemed to me in studying the farm problems in central and northern New York, under conditions which prevail over a considerable part of the country certainly, that one very important thing is that there shall be suggested and taught to farmers, particularly to the small farmers, a method of utilizing their farms so that the need for employment will come along at one time after another and run during the greater part of the year. It certainly is under some conditions possible to bring about an equalization of requirement for labor instead of having a very high requirement at one time during the year and not during the remainder. Does not the Senator think something useful might be done in that direction?

Mr. GRONNA. I want to thank the distinguished Senator from New York for making the observation. It is absolutely true, as he has stated, and the condition in my State is exactly as he has stated. But, Mr. President, the provision of this bill is that 75 per cent of the money which we are now appropriating shall be used absolutely for field tests. If the provisions of the Lever bill were such that we could use this appropriation in educating the farmers to change the present methods of farming and thereby change present conditions, to give instructions how to grow new crops, how to change the farm from a grain farm to a dairy farm, then, Mr. President, I should have nothing to say in opposition to taking 75 per cent of this entire appropriation for that work.

We grow certain crops and have become, so to speak, specialists in producing them. We want to get away from that idea of growing but one kind of a crop, and the bill proposed by the Senator from Vermont will in a large measure help the agricultural interests in that way. We want more prosperity and fewer hobos. We are sick and tired of feeding and employing the large population of hobos that come from the cities that we necessarily have been employing during the summer months. They are not fit to perform the labor that is to be performed on the farm; they know no more about the business of farming than the farmer as a class knows about the profession of the law; they are incapable of performing their work in a satisfactory manner to the farmer or to those who employ them. But, sir, teach them vocations and trades and then let them come to our part of the country, and although we may have to pay them just as high wages as we are paying them now, they will be able to perform their work in a better way. You will have increased the efficiency of those men, for they have been taught how to perform labor.

The condition in the country in the rural districts is such that it is absolutely impossible to get competent labor on the farm. Why, sir, it is necessary for those who own their farms to work from 12 to 18 hours per day; and the necessary labor can not be had. It goes to show two things—first, that the business of farming is not profitable, and, secondly, that labor can not be had. You tell me the farmer has been very successful. Yes; he has been successful, because his land has increased in value. But take the farmer as a class, take his business as a producer, allow him reasonable wages for his work, and I say without fear of successful contradiction that within the last two decades farming has not been a profitable business.

I believe, sir, that the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont should have serious consideration. It may be that certain changes should be made in the measure, but I do not want to see it voted down simply on sentiment.

Neither do I want to let the so-called House bill pass without calling attention to the fact. I want the RECORD to show, if you please, that this legislation is not asked for by the farmer. I am not here to oppose it because the farmer does not ask for it. I am not here simply for the purpose of representing the farmer. I am here to help to the best of my ability each and every industry of the United States, but I do not want it to be understood that in the appropriation of this large amount of money you are simply appropriating it for the farmer, because you are not, and you know that you are not. I do not want the name of the farmer conjured with right here to help along other industries. I am willing to help other industries, as I have said, but let us do it upon their merits, or let us oppose them upon their demerits.

Mr. President, I have received a newspaper printed in my State, and I found in that paper the synopsis of a speech delivered by the president of our agricultural college, a most splendid man, a learned man, a man of great ability and with splendid education and experience in farming. He has this to say:

> Good farming is the best insurance against crop failure. Farming is a business. It requires a better business head, a man of broader vision, to farm scientifically than to practice in any other profession.

That is a statement said to have been made by President Worst, of the Agricultural College of North Dakota.

Mr. President, if this is true, why should we look upon this matter in such a narrow way? Why should we look upon this industry as one that is being carried on by a lot of uneducated, ignorant men, who do not know any more than just how to hold the plow? I believe, sir, that if we pass the so-called Lever bill we should change the section of the bill which provides that three-fourths of this appropriation shall be used for field tests. I do not remember if the appropriation is contained in the first section. I will ask the Senator from Georgia in what section is embodied the provision that 75 per cent of the appropriation shall be used for field tests?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that is the third section. That was a provision put on in the other House, the Senator will remember. That was not in the original bill as I introduced it in the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, that is the very reason why I am making these few observations, in the hope that those Senators who are present to hear me will be willing to help me in changing that provision.

For years, Mr. President, we have been trying to change our methods of farming, and right here is a provision taking 75 per cent of the entire appropriation to be used for something that the farmer is trying to get away from.

It is not true that there is a shortage of farm products in this country; it is not true that the high cost of living is due to the high prices of agricultural products. In my town we have as good a market as can be found anywhere in the western country, and yet last fall we were compelled to sell our wheat as low as 67 cents per bushel; we had to sell our oats at 20 cents per bushel; we received from 30 to 32 cents per bushel for barley, and I presume that those who drink beer pay the same price as heretofore to those patriotic brewers who were here about a year ago and who were making such clamor all over the country against the high cost of living. I suppose that they are receiving the same amount for their beer now that they did when they paid $1.54 per bushel for barley. The other day, going through the city of Minneapolis, I stepped into a grocery store and asked the grocer, whom I have known for more than 30 years, a man who is still in that business, what reduction, if any, had been made in the price of cereals. To my astonishment I found that, with oats at 20 cents per bushel, Quaker Oats in packages were selling at the same price that they were when we received 52 cents per bushel—not a reduction of a single cent. I found, to my surprise, that Corn Flakes, Pettijohn's Breakfast Food—in fact, all the cereals—are selling at the same price now that they were a year ago, when the price of grain was double what it is to-day; and yet the people in the cities believe, and honestly so, that the high prices paid for the farm products is the cause of the high cost of living.

If you want to help the farmer, if you want to help the people of the country, do something for them that will aid distribution. If those of you who live in the cities and are complaining because of the high cost of living will help us to devise some method whereby we can distribute all this immense amount of products that are now going to waste, you will be benefited; you will get your products at a lower cost, and the farmer will get a fair and reasonable price for the products of his labor.

Mr. President, the matter of greatest importance to the farmer and to the country is not in showing the farmer how to farm, but the great question before the country, so far as agriculture is concerned and so far as the comfort and enjoyment of the people who depend upon the farming industry are concerned, is how to develop methods whereby the farmer can receive a fair price for his products, and to facilitate distribution in such a way that the public may receive the products of the farm at reasonable prices.

Millions of bushels of vegetables go to decay in certain sections of our country, while in other sections the public is hungry for them. In my State, North Dakota, thousands and thousands of acres of potatoes were not dug, but were left in the ground for fertilizer. Because they were selling at prices that would not pay for the labor, there would have been an absolute loss in taking them out of the ground, and so they were left there to decay. At the same time I found right here in the city of Washington that potatoes were selling for $1.10 a bushel, although in North Dakota we could not receive 15 to 25 cents a bushel; yet the farmer is being charged with direct responsibility for the high cost of living.

Ah, Mr. President, this is a serious proposition. I want, so far as I am able, to convince the Senate that it is not true that there is a scarcity of farm products in the United States. It is not true, sir, that the farmer is the cause, directly or indirectly, of the high cost of living.

Mr. President, it was with reluctance and a good deal of hesitancy that I began to make these observations upon this bill. In the first place, I know the meaning of the bill; I know, sir, that there is a powerful element back of it. Every banker in the cities, in the towns, and in the villages is demanding or asking for the passage of the bill. I am not going to say that they misunderstand it, but I am going to say that if they understood the provisions of this bill as I understand them they would not be so enthusiastic as they are in favor of its passage.

I am not willing to let it go unchallenged; I am not willing to have it said that we are passing a measure just for the benefit of the farmer. It would not be fair to the country to pass any measure that would benefit one industry at the expense of another; but I believe, sir, that if you want to do something for the country you must commence to educate the boy and the girl. It is too late to educate the old farmer. His mind is settled, his ideas are fixed, and you will not meet with very great success in going upon his farm and making field tests to show him how he will be better able to produce more grain per acre.

If you want to help the people of the United States you will accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], because that is a measure wide enough in its scope to benefit not only one industry, but every industry in the United States. Oh, you may tell me that there is no necessity for vocational education or for instruction in the trades and home economics. Are you going to deny the farmer's daughter the opportunity of getting an education in home economics? Are you going to deny to the children of the men of the cities the right to receive some instruction in the trades and in the vocations which are absolutely necessary to carry on the great industries of this country? I care not where these men may be located or where they may live, when you have taken their boys or their girls and given them an education in the vocations, in the trades, or in home economics, you have increased their efficiency, you have done something for the people of our country.

The Senator from Georgia is perhaps as well qualified to talk upon this subject as any man in the Senate. I have not tried, Mr. President, to express any theory of my own or to advance any new philosophy. I have simply called attention to a few facts which are practical in everyday life. I desire to repeat, in order to emphasize the fact, that there is as much need for vocational education and knowledge of the trades on the farm as anywhere else on earth, because the farmer, to be successful, must at least have some one in his family or some one on his farm who has knowledge and ability as a blacksmith, as a carpenter, and as a harness maker.

The farmer's wife certainly is expected to understand her duties as a housewife, and she has the absolute right to instruction in home economics as much as anyone else.

I did not expect to take up so much of the time of the Senate. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] reminds me, however, of something I have overlooked—that it is as difficult, and more so, to get servants to help do the housework as it is to get laborers to do the work on the farm. Farmers who are getting along in years and who find it difficult—and they all find it difficult—to have the work done on the farm, are anxious to sell their farms, not because they do not love farm work—because it is a delightful work if you are not worked too hard—but because it is impossible, under existing conditions, to take any recreation and enjoy the pleasure that every man and woman is entitled to whether in the city or in the country. It is impossible to get service either in the house or upon the farm.

For these reasons, Mr. President, if we are to pass a bill at all, I ask Senators to consider the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont upon its merits, and if they do, I believe they will incorporate it in the House bill or accept it in place of the House bill.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, agricultural education and education in the trades should go hand in hand. They are of equal importance. Our way of living in this day leads us to interchange the labor of the city and the labor of the country, both in the matter of seasons and in the effort to better conditions. Sometimes it drifts toward the country and sometimes toward the city. Our smaller places throughout the country are getting to be manufacturing places as well as the cities. So we have industrial pursuits and agricultural pursuits all mixed up, and there is no reason why they should not be treated upon a par.

I am therefore in favor of providing for education in the trades as well as for education in agriculture, both at the same time and in the same way.

There is another thing that is sometimes overlooked. That is that farming is no longer a matter of everyday drudgery. Farming to-day is done by machinery; and there is nothing so much needed on the farm to-day to make it profitable and to make farm life tolerable as that the farm people shall be educated in the trades.

Take the matter of engineering, for instance. It might be thought that that would never be practiced except in the cities. But to-day the traction engine is going all over the country, it is taking the place of the horse, and engineers are wanted everywhere.

Take the milling of the country. Not very far back it was confined to the cities and to places that had water power and to places where it was convenient to build steam mills. Nowadays the power is furnished by gasoline engines, which are being sold literally by the million to go to all parts of the country. It is necessary to have men who are skilled in the trades not only to operate those engines, but to operate all of the subsidiary machinery that goes with them.

So I think what we should do, Mr. President, is to adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, and to pass it and the so-called Lever bill at the same time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	McLean	Sanders
Bankhead	Gamble	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Bradley	Gardner	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Gronna	Newlands	Smith, Ga.
Bristow	Guggenheim	Oliver	Smoot
Brown	Hitchcock	Overman	Stephenson
Bryan	Jackson	Owen	Swanson
Burnham	Johnson, Me.	Page	Thomas
Catron	Johnston, Ala.	Paynter	Townsend
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Percy	Wetmore
Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Perkins	Williams
Crawford	Kern	Perky	Works
Cullom	Lippitt	Pomerene
Dillingham	Lodge	Richardson
Fletcher	McCumber	Root

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll 57 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] to strike out section 10 of the proposed amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia will not prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll will be called on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). In the absence of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] from the city I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and vote "nay."

Mr. GARDNER (when his name was called). Notwithstanding my pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE] I am at liberty to vote on this proposition. I vote "nay."

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. Not knowing how he would vote upon this question I withhold my vote.

Mr. RICHARDSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote I would vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I wish to announce my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and therefore I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and let my vote stand.

Mr. CUMMINS. The junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is absent from the Senate on public business.

Mr. BANKHEAD (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE], who is absent on business of the Senate, and I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (after Mr. GALLINGER had voted in the negative). The present occupant of the chair is paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. As that Senator has not voted, the vote is withdrawn.

The result was announced, yeas 12, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—12.

Ashurst	Burton	Perky	Smith, Ariz.
Bryan	Heiskell	Pomerene	Smith, Ga.
Burnham	McCumber	Root	Thomas

Culberson	Lea	Richardson

So the amendment of Mr. SMITH of Georgia to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On page 16, of section 21, I move to strike out, beginning at the middle of line 15, the balance of section 21.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 15, after the numerals and the semicolon, strike out the remainder of the section in the following words:

But the total number of such agricultural high schools in any State shall not be less than 1 for each 15 counties nor more than 1 for each 5 counties or fraction of 5 counties. Any such agricultural high school shall be open to admission without tuition charges and upon the same conditions to all persons otherwise qualified as herein provided residing in the district in which such school is located; but such school may be supported and controlled by the State, or by the district in which it is located, or by a portion thereof.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I hope the amendment may not prevail.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to state why I think it is important that this amendment should prevail. The provision that I move to strike out undertakes to limit the size of the territory in which these high schools shall exist. It says that in no case shall there be less than 5 counties and in no case shall there be more than 15 counties. I think the authorities of the State ought to be allowed to determine the size of the territory covered by an agricultural high school.

The only effect of the amendment to strike out is to leave the size of the territory in which the agricultural high schools are to exist to the authorities of the State. I can not see any advantage in undertaking to determine it ourselves by counties. Some counties are very large and other counties are very small. Some States have very small counties and other States have very large counties. To say that no high school, no matter how small the counties, shall have over 15 counties, and that no high school, no matter how large the counties, should have less than 5 counties, it seems to me is an unnecessary interference with the plan of location of the high schools.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Georgia please suspend for a moment? The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WORKS. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The object of my motion is to free the bill from that objection. It does not in any sense lessen the appropriation for the agricultural high schools. It lets the agricultural high schools stand exactly upon the plan the bill provides, but it removes the limitations as to territory.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood the amendment as read by the Secretary to include also the last sentence of the section. Possibly that was a mistake.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was a mistake. It is to strike out all down to the word "but."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have the amendment stated again from the desk, so that we may know exactly what is proposed to be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 16, after the numerals and the semicolon, strike out down to and including the word "located" and the semicolon on line 23 in the following words:

But the total number of such agricultural high schools in any State shall not be less than one for each 15 counties nor more than one for each 5 counties or fraction of 5 counties. Any such agricultural high schools shall be open to admission without tuition charges and upon the same conditions to all persons otherwise qualified as herein provided residing in the district in which such school is located.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I do not wish to take the time of the Senate for one minute on this matter. I will simply say that this bill has been submitted to the different States, and 35 of the different States have said that they approve this feature of the bill, or they have really approved the bill and have not objected to this feature.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute submitted by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. I now wish to withdraw that amendment with the consent of the Senate. May I be permitted to do so?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment having been amended, it would not be in order.

Mr. PAGE. I give notice that when the bill comes into the Senate I shall move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the Page bill in its entirety.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont as a substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no further amendments be proposed as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PAGE. I now move in the Senate, instead of the amendments as reported by the Committee of the Whole, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the Page bill in its entirety.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think that is a great mistake on the part of the Senator from Vermont. I hardly think it is treating justly those who have helped make this measure. He came in himself with the House bill; we perfected the House bill, and we put in the essence of his bill which was not contained in the House bill as an amendment to the House bill. Now, he goes back to his bill No. 3, abandons the amendments that we have just adopted, abandons the bill that we have adopted as in Committee of the Whole, and asks us to strike out the measure that we have perfected as in Committee of the Whole.

I only desire to let the Senate understand what his motion is, and upon agreeing to it I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Vermont will not press that amendment. I feel it is hardly just to those who have supported his proposed measure who are friends of the Lever bill and who assumed from statements he made that he was willing to accept the Lever bill as a part of his own measure. I certainly have acted upon the theory that the Senator from Vermont was willing to incorporate his bill and the Lever bill in one measure, and now to make a change at this time it seems to me is not wise and it is hardly just.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I wish to say that on the 17th day of January I made a motion to amend. After I had made that motion the Senator from Georgia came to me and asked me if we could not reach some compromise. It almost took my breath away when he came, and I said——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to correct the Senator. I did not ask the Senator to make a compromise.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I will retract what I said. I will say that I stood upon the other side of the Chamber and the Senator came to me, and that is what I understood him to say. I said, "Senator, I am very happy indeed to do this, because my friends on this side have urged me to make some compromise with Senator SMITH. I will meet you at your house and we will see if we can not agree upon some compromise." I did so, and when I came back into the Senate imagine my surprise when I found that that compromise had not been understood by the Senator from Georgia. We have found ourselves with a variety of changes of views here in regard to the amendment which I offered on the 24th day of January, as I supposed to meet the wishes and views of the Senator from Georgia. I find that I was mistaken.

Now, I want to say to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], because he has been a friend of this measure from the first, that Senate bill No. 3 and the Lever bill are almost identical, the difference being that the Lever bill appropriates $3,480,000 and Senate bill No. 3, $3,000,000. I would be quite willing that in conference any amendment should be made that was thought best, but for the time being I find that I have embarrassed my friends here by offering the amendment, which I certainly did in good faith to meet, as I supposed, the views of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont a question. I understood Friday afternoon that he contemplated offering the Page bill, commencing at section 10, as an amendment to the Lever bill. I understood that that was to be the method of procedure. If I mistake not he gave me marked out what he purposed to offer as an amendment, commencing at section 10. It was to be offered as an amendment to the Lever bill, and it would go on that bill as an amendment. I am frank to say that it was my purpose to vote that that amendment should go on the Lever bill. But to come in now and offer it as a substitute, when the House of Representatives has passed the Lever bill, and we have perfected it, to throw out our entire work and offer a substitute, it seems to me is not acting in good faith with those who were working for the Page bill, and it is not wise to do it.

I understand that the Lever bill is a part of the Page bill, and after section 10, as amended, it includes all that the Senator desires.

It appears to me that the right course to pursue for those of us who have been cooperating is to continue the method of cooperation we have been following. Why should the House of Representatives be slapped in the face? They sent this bill here for our consideration. The purpose is to get legislation and not the mere prestige of having a bill with a different name attached to it. It seems to me the right course for us to pursue is to stand by the amendment as we understood it was to be offered and as it has been adopted.

Then the bill can properly be considered as the product of both the House and the Senate. If you want to accomplish this legislation—if we are anxious to bring the benefits to the country—the right way to do it promptly and efficiently is to amend the Lever bill and let the Lever bill stand with the portions of the Page bill desired as an amendment to that bill.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I simply repeat myself when I say that I consented to the amendment offered by me on the 24th day of January with a good deal of reluctance as to many of its features, but being urged, as I was by the friends of the measure on this side, to reach some compromise with the Senator from Georgia, if possible, I consented to amendments to which I did not fully subscribe. As far as I understand the matter, the arrangement, if one was made—I will withdraw that because the Senator from Georgia says there was no arrangement—the proposal which I made or which we made, it makes no difference, was disagreed to because the Senator from Georgia came in here and notified the Senate that he was opposed to the amendment which I offered on January 24 as a substitute measure. Having made that offer in good faith as a compromise and having had that compromise repudiated, I now wish to say to the Senate that I have spent two years in perfecting this bill and I believe it is right, and inasmuch as that compromise was repudiated, I hope the Senate will pass the Page bill in its entirety without the change of a comma, and when we get into conference I will be as square as anyone in trying to reach legislation. I believe that——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. PAGE. If the Senator will allow me to finish the sentence, I believe that the Lever bill and the Page bill are identical except in some very few minor particulars.

If it was not so, I would say that it was absolutely improper for me to take the course I am pursuing. But inasmuch as it is simply a matter of words and a matter of construction, the material points of the Lever bill and the Page bill being the same, I hope the Senate will now pass the Page bill in its entirety without the change of a single comma.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator from Vermont will not insist on his motion. I believe the Senators on this side will feel that they have been misled, and misled by the Senator from Vermont. I am sure that is the way I feel about it.

I listened very closely to the Senator's speech at the time he offered his bill as a substitute for the Lever bill. On two separate occasions during his argument the Senator stated that he had incorporated in his bill the Lever bill, without crossing a "t" or dotting an "i."

I am in favor of the Lever bill and I am in favor of the principle of the balance of the bill of the Senator from Vermont, although I think it is rather crudely drawn, and it ought to be redrafted. I want to be sure that we will get some legislation, and I think it would be unwise for us to materially amend the Lever bill in whatever bill we may pass here. I trust the Senator from Vermont will not insist upon his motion.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from North Carolina is acting under a misapprehension when he supposes that in my proposed amendment I am materially changing the Lever bill. There are some few minor differences, and only a few.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the changes are immaterial, why should the Senator ask us now to take a different measure from that which he offered as a substitute in the beginning, with the positive and repeated assurance that he did not change the Lever bill in any particular, either as to letter or as to punctuation?

Mr. PAGE. I can only say I believe the amendment of January 24 was somewhat crude, because it was drawn in a good deal of haste. I wish to say that so far as the original bill is concerned it has been drawn with the greatest care and every detail looked after. I believe the Page bill, Senate bill No. 3, as originally before the Senate January 17, is a perfected measure. I am far from certain that the new bill is; and I simply say that, inasmuch as they reach the same conclusion substantially, I would rather have the original bill passed than to take the chances of an imperfect bill, which I think may have been drawn in consequence of the proposed arrangement with the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry. I understand the Senator from Vermont offered an amendment which he had printed some days ago?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. No; the amendment has not been agreed to. Do I understand the Senator has withdrawn that amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the amendment has been agreed to as in Committee of the Whole and reported to the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. Now, his amendment was agreed to, and as I understand the parliamentary situation, after we come into the Senate he changes his program in the Senate from what he followed as in Committee of the Whole. If we vote against his bill as a substitute it still gives us an opportunity to vote for that amendment as adopted in the Senate. So if we vote down the bill he offers as a substitute—the Lever bill, with the amendment made—and following, section 10 will still be before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, it would be most unfortunate if any misunderstanding exists between the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Vermont which would result in a confusion in the consideration of this bill as to some of us who have not kept up with it as closely as our duty requires, largely upon the faith we had in those two Senators. I believed that the progress which was made in maturing the bill has been in the direction of an adjustment that would be satisfactory; and if it were not, it left the bill in such a condition that it might be perfected in the conference committee. Unless the matter is in dispute between the two Houses it would not be subject to the jurisdiction of that committee.

As I understand what has transpired here within the last few days, there has been an effort made to pick out from the two bills the merits of both and unite them in a common bill, and that that end has been substantially attained in the report that was made by the Committee of the Whole to the Senate.

I would not like to differ with my worthy friend from Vermont on a question of recollection about a matter that would be material if a dispute should arise over it; but many of us, as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], have been very agreeable witnesses to the fact that this harmonious condition existed between himself and the Senator from Georgia.

Now, if we vote to strike down the Lever bill with all the wholesome amendments that have been added to it by the action of the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and to take up the original Page bill, it would require us to familiarize ourselves a little more with that particular bill than would otherwise be the case. A situation therefore has been created that would take some of us by surprise, or at least find us in a state of unpreparedness, which would not otherwise exist had the two bills been projected from the beginning.

I am willing to yield my judgment to the Senator from Vermont on this particular measure, but in view of what has transpired I feel somewhat committed to vote against his proposition to submit his bill as an entirety in its original form. I feel like I should vote to ratify by the action of the Senate the amendments that have been reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I regret the Senator from Vermont should suggest that any agreement between himself and myself in any way was not carried out. I hesitate about referring to matters that took place in private. I will only do so to this extent: I will state that the Senator from Vermont had for a number of weeks been urging me to have a private conference with him with reference to his bill, and finally he even suggested that he would call at my house, which I, of course, invited him to do. I was glad to see him there, and for several hours the subject was discussed, and I expressed certain criticisms with reference to the bill and suggested certain modifications of it. The Senator from Vermont made some modifications in the bill, and I explained to him that I did not mean even then that I could support the entire measure as he had redrafted it, although with two small exceptions this morning I reached the conclusion that I would vote for the majority of the provisions that he put into his amendment.

I want to state just what my attitude with reference to the matter is. I am deeply interested in seeing some legislation passed at this session. I begin with what we term the Lever bill. I am exceedingly anxious to see that bill passed, as the House has already passed it. If we can not get anything more than it, I prefer it to nothing.

I would be glad to see also added a provision starting the work of vocational education; I would be glad to see a provision starting the contribution to the agricultural high schools; and I would be glad to see a provision contributing something to the normal schools for instruction in industrial work.

That I did not agree to the entire measure as the Senator from Vermont presented it is true, and I do not now approve it as a whole. I do not believe we can possibly get it as a whole, and I do not think the Senate expects it. I think the Senate to-day in voting for it looks to see it improved and perfected in conference.

Now, what have we done to-day? What has been the result of the work we have been engaged on for a number of days? We have been trying to prepare a bill we hoped we might pass. We begin by taking the bill which the House has already passed. That is their idea of agricultural-extension work. We made a few small amendments to it, and we prepared to go back to the House, saying "We agree with you on your measure; we are taking no substantial issue with you on the measure you have approved; but we have added some amendments, and we invite you to come and join us in adding these amendments to the measure which you matured and passed."

That is what we did as in Committee of the Whole. We adopted those amendments, and those amendments which we adopted, going beyond what I thought it was advisable to adopt, cover practically the whole of the vocational work that was contemplated in the original Senate bill No. 3. We have added that vocational work to the House extension bill. We voted on it, and after we have acted upon it; after we have discussed it for days; after we have made a few amendments to it—not very material; after the two pieces of work have been put together, starting with the House bill and following on with the vocational bill of the Senator from Vermont, when we come into the Senate the Senator from Vermont asks us to repudiate the work of the Committee of the Whole and go back and take up a bill that we have not read, and which has not been considered at all in these days of work that we have been putting upon this measure. If we take that course, we shall take the best course we could pursue to kill the whole measure. As, I believe, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has said, we practically slap the House in the face.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Some of us were not present all of the time, and I think we would be gratified if the Senator from Georgia would explain to us wherein the amendment now offered by the Senator from Vermont differs from the bill as perfected in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would have to take it and read it all over and study it in order to do that. I do not know exactly.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Vermont says there is practically no difference.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, if that is true, why not adhere to what we have been working on for three or four days?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not giving my own opinion one way or the other. I am simply asking if the Senator can show us wherein there is a difference?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not. I would, as I have said, have to take the bill up and restudy it. I have had my attention given for the past three days to the details of the measure before the Senate; I have had my attention given to the extension work of the House bill; and I have dismissed from my mind the other measure so far as it was contained in the original Page bill, No. 3.

Mr. McCUMBER. There seemed to be some objection, Mr. President, on the other side to the amendment because it was abandoning the House bill. Well, every amendment abandons it to some extent, and as amendments have been put in the bill in Committee of the Whole, I can not see the force of the claim of abandonment, because the bill will still remain the House bill, bearing the House number, acted upon in the Senate in either instance as a House bill, or the Lever bill, amended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The proposition now of the Senator from Vermont is to strike everything out of the House bill but the title, to add a new title, and to substitute for it Senate bill No. 3, that we have not had under consideration as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McCUMBER. But it would still be the House bill, bearing the House number, and would hold its place and occupy a position as the House bill. That would not change it and make it a Senate bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would have the number of the House bill, with nothing in it that the House put into it.

Mr. WORKS. Mr President, the broad statement has been made here, and has been made several times, that this is not only an abandonment of the House bill, but that it strikes out everything that is contained in that bill. On the contrary, I understood that this amendment includes the provisions of the House bill substantially as they passed the House. If that be so, it is simply an addition to the work that has been done by the House, and it is in no sense an abandonment of the House bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. You will have to take it up and study it to find out whether it is or not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The statement made by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] leads me to ask the Senator from Georgia if he will not state to the Senate the essential differences between these two bills as they deal with extension departments, which have already been established under the law.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am not prepared, without some lengthy attention to the matter, to do so. I have dismissed the provisions of Senate bill No. 3 from my mind for quite a length of time. I have been devoting my attention to helping perfect the bill as it was passed in the other House, and I have been studying that bill to the exclusion of the other. I would have to go back to it and study it again in order to do what the Senator from Wisconsin requests.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not mean, Mr. President, in all details, but just simply that the Senator from Georgia state to us the essential differences. I have no doubt, from the study which the Senator from Georgia has made of these two measures, of his ability to clearly place before the Senate those differences.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think I could mention two or three. The amount of the appropriation is different in the two bills. There is a provision in the House bill that nothing contained in that bill shall interfere with the demonstration work now being done by the Department of Agriculture, which we perfected here so as to provide that it should not interfere with certain work in the line of plant industries. In the House bill there is a provision as to the way in which the fund is to be used that is not contained in the Senate bill. The details of the plan of handling the money and the description of the responsibility of the Secretary of Agriculture with reference to the matter are somewhat different. I think it is worked out more in detail in the House bill than it is as contained in the original Page bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Georgia whether it be true, or not, that the provision in the Page bill covering the subject of the Lever bill is found in section 7?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I therefore suggest, if the Senator from Georgia can not state the differences, that the Secretary read the Lever bill and then read section 7 of the Page bill. We can all tell, then, what are the differences.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I infer from the debate that it was the understanding of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] when he introduced the amendment that was adopted as a substitute for the Lever bill that he had reached an agreement of some kind with the friends of the Lever bill in the Senate, but it appears that that was a misunderstanding, and that the friends of the Lever bill now seem to be opposed to the amendment; that they did oppose it and voted against it. I happened to be absent when the vote was taken, but there was a division. The consequence is that, unless we adopt the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Vermont and go back to his original bill, which was the bill considered by the committee, the bill upon which he has worked, as he says; which he has had more or less before the Senate for the last year, at least, and on which he delivered his speech of June 5, 1912—unless we go back to that original bill and take that, we will be passing an amendment here with which nobody is satisfied.

The Senator from Vermont says that he made the concessions which were contained in that amendment in order to reach an agreement with the friends of the Lever bill, but it seems that he failed in that object. The Senator from Vermont prefers the original bill to the amendment. The Senator from Georgia is not satisfied with the amendment. So it would seem to be the reasonable thing to do, if the Senate, as is evident, is in favor of vocational education—of education in the trades and industries, and of providing for Federal aid to agricultural schools—to adopt the bill which has received the greatest care and consideration on the part of the committee and of the Senator from Vermont, which includes all of the provisions which have been suggested by him, and to allow those provisions to go to conference, so that they may be considered there.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask what feature is there in the original bill No. 3 which has not been put on by amendment? Can the Senator from Washington state?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The amendment is almost identical with the bill, except as to minor differences. The title is different; it drops the bill which has come to be known as the Page bill; it deprives, in a measure, the Senator from Vermont of the credit of the legislation by dropping his bill and taking up an amendment. I understand it is true that in its principal features the amendment which has been adopted is identical with the original bill, but the Senator from Vermont prefers the form of the original bill; he prefers the manner in which it is expressed. It has been considered by the committee. I confess that I have not had an opportunity to consider the details of the form of these several bills, and I am simply speaking about the parliamentary situation in which we find ourselves—that we have adopted an amendment here which has not received the favor of either side to the controversy as between the Lever bill and the Page bill. The Page bill is conceded by everybody to contain substantially the Lever bill, also a number of additional features. We should adopt that bill and allow the matter to go to conference, so that the form of this legislation, the substance of which the Senate seems to have agreed to—there are very few here who are opposed to it, and it is a question of the form in which it is guarded, the manner in which these appropriations are to be expended—so that the form of the legislation can be finished and perfected in conference between the two Houses.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. ROOT. I rose to ask the Senator from Washington if he would point out, or perhaps the Senator from Vermont might point out, those portions of the original bill No. 3, which we speak of as the Page bill—the original, I mean, which he now moves to substitute—which reproduce the provisions of the Lever bill? I ask, Mr. President, because I am much interested in perfecting our system of conveying information about agriculture to the farmers of the country by means of these extension departments and field demonstrations. I think that it is just as important for this country now to increase the productivity of agriculture as it ever was to increase the productivity of manufacturing when the original protective tariff was adopted.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. Excuse me for one moment. I should not like to have any substitute adopted here which leaves out the practical and effective provisions of the bill which the Senator from Georgia has been urging. On the other hand, I am a very firm believer in the importance of vocational education. I am not convinced that the Government of the United States ought to go into that, and I am far from being convinced that the scheme which has been evolved here for imposing control by the Government of the United States upon the secondary schools of the country is a wise scheme. I have very grave doubt about that; but I certainly do not want to vote upon this great mass of provisions without knowing the relation of one to the other. If the Senator will point out what parts of the Page bill, which he now moves to substitute, reproduce the provisions of the Lever bill, I shall be very much obliged to him.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. ROOT. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. I should like to ask the Senator from New York this question: No one denies that we are all interested in the productivity of agriculture and individually we desire a large yield; but I should like to have the Senator from New York point out to me where the farmer is particularly benefited by the production of large crops, in every section of our country, so that we have a large surplus. In other words, is it not true that we have no means whereby the farmer can regulate the price of his products at all, while, on the other hand, the manufacturer, whether he produces much or little, fixes the price of his product—something that the farmer can not do?

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, answering the——

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I feel bound to answer the question of the Senator from North Dakota, if the Senator from Vermont will allow me.

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. All the farmers whom I have ever known—and I have known a great many—would rather get 28 bushels of wheat to the acre than 14; they would feel better about it. The fact that the farmer individually can not regulate the prices of his products is no reason why his farm should not be made as productive as possible. The demand for food products in this country and throughout the world is increasing continually; the increased demand is continually increasing the prices which the farmer receives for his products; and as that demand continues to increase with the increase of population, the farmer stands to receive continually remunerative prices for his product, and, in my judgment, that increasing demand and the continuance of remunerative prices keep pace with the best improvement that is possible on the farms of this country.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am afraid the Senator from New York misunderstood my question. I confess that I am as much in favor as is anyone else of increasing the productivity of our soil, and so, I believe, are the farmers of this country, but what I should like the Senator from New York, or any other Senator, to point out to me is the advantage that the farming industry or the farmer has received by the production of a large surplus. Is it not true that when this country has a large crop prices are reduced in proportion to the size of the crop? In 1910, for instance, there was a small crop all over the country, and in 1911 we had only a fair crop, but the farmers made money in 1911, while in 1912, with overproduction, there was practically a loss to the agricultural interests of the United States.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] has asked me to point out the differences between the Lever bill and the Page bill, so far as what is known in the two bills as college extension work is concerned.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand the Senator from New York to inquire as to the difference between the substitute which the Senator from Vermont now offers and the bill which the Senate has agreed to as in Committee of the Whole. That is what I should like to know also.

Mr. PAGE. I was about to explain.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to know what difference there is between those two measures.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I asked rather for the similarity than the difference. I want to know where in the Page bill occur the provisions which are similar or which accomplish the same effect as the provisions which are in the Lever bill. I can not find them.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. PAGE. I should like to answer the Senator from New York for just a moment, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. OWEN. Just a moment. It seems to me that the point which needs explaining is the extent to which the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole do not include the Page bill.

Mr. PAGE. I will be very happy to answer that question. In the first place, Mr. President, the Page bill gives $3,000,000 to college extension work, $3,000,000 to district agricultural schools, $3,000,000 to education in the rural communities, and $3,000,000 to education in the cities. There are four $3,000,000 appropriations. The Lever bill leaves out appropriations for industrial schools and adds $480,000 to college extension work. I consented to that. I do not know that I now object seriously to it, but still it seems to me that the $480,000 added by the Lever bill is more than ought to go to that feature of the work in consideration of what we have given to the other features.

Next, the Page bill from first to last provides that whatever the Federal Government shall do shall be matched by the States. The Lever bill does not do that. As to the $10,000 to each State which is immediately forthcoming and available under the Lever bill, it is provided that the States may have that fund absolutely without duplicating it. That is so contrary to the entire principle of the Page bill that I only yielded to the amendment because I wished to get a reasonable compromise. Third, the Lever bill contains this provision:

SEC. 3. That all correspondence for the furtherance of the purposes of this act issued from the agricultural colleges to their agents or by the agents of the said extension departments thereof receiving the benefits of this act shall be transmitted in the mails of the United States free of charge for postage, under such regulations as the Postmaster General from time to time may prescribe.

This provision was originally in Senate bill No. 3, but after very careful discussion it was thought to be an unsafe and unwise provision to incorporate. I do not know how many protests I received from publishers of agricultural papers in this country, who said to me: "If you incorporate this provision into your bill, you will perhaps allow the agricultural colleges to begin to publish newspapers; they can publish anything; and they can have, and will have, an unfair advantage over the agricultural press of this country, which ought to have a fair show in the fight, and they will not have it if you say that all the agricultural colleges may have the right to send everything they wish through the mails free." As every Senator knows, under the present statute they already have the right to send free the periodicals which they issue regularly. I do not know how extensive that privilege is; but, be that as it may, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, after considering it, thought it best to exclude that provision. That provision comes back to us from the House in the Lever bill.

I do not regard that as a very unwise feature; and as a compromise measure I was willing to accept it. I do not regard it as particularly unwise to add half a million dollars to the appropriation. As a matter of compromise, I was willing to accept that. I do not particularly object to giving the money to the States without making them duplicate it with an appropriation from their own treasuries; but I think it is wrong; I do not believe it is the best way. I believe the Page bill is the better way; and so, having failed of a compromise, I now come to say that, whereas I yielded reluctantly to these measures because of a supposed compromise, the compromise having been repudiated, I now ask that the Page bill in its original simplicity be enacted.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I do not know or care anything about the compromises which have been made or the conferences which have been held. The Senator from Vermont has not answered the question. I will put it more distinctly. Where in the bill which he moves to substitute are contained the provisions which reproduce the same effect as the provisions of section 2 of the Lever bill?

Mr. PAGE. If the Senator from New York has before him the original amendment proposed by me on the 17th of January, or if he has the original Page bill, he will find in it this provision:

That for the support——

Mr. BRISTOW and Mr. CRAWFORD. Where is that?

Mr. PAGE. On page 6 of the amendment offered by me on January 17, or in section 7 of the original Page bill, Senate bill No. 3. That provision reads in this way:

SEC. 7. That for the support in each State college of agriculture and the mechanic arts of an extension department or division, the sum of $640,000 annually, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913—

Let me explain that——

Mr. CRAWFORD. For what purpose is that?

Mr. PAGE. I will read further:

of which annual appropriation $10,000 shall be allotted to each of the 48 States for the benefit of such extension departments; and for the maintenance of such extension departments, the additional sum of $400,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

And so on, until it reaches $3,000,000. I do not need to read further, because it simply provides for the extension from year to year until $3,000,000 is reached.

Mr. ROOT. What is to be done with it?

Mr. PAGE. It is for what is known as college extension work. If Senators will turn to the bottom of page 2 in the original Senate bill No. 3, they will find what this work means. It is there described as follows:

Third. "Agricultural-extension department or division" shall mean a department or division which is established under the provisions of this act and under the direction of a State college of agriculture and the mechanic arts in any State, and which gives instruction and demonstrations in agriculture and home economics to persons not residing at said college nor at the district agricultural schools provided for in this act and which conveys or imparts to such persons information on such subjects through field demonstrations, publications, and otherwise.

That is almost the exact provision of the Lever bill; there is a difference in language; but, so far as the purpose of the bill is concerned, it is almost identical. It relates to work carried from the experiment stations to the adult farmer on the farm. It covers that in both bills. If Senators will recall the discussions we have been having here in the Senate for the last year, they will remember that the provisions of the Smith bill, so called because the Senator from Georgia last spring introduced into the Senate a bill substantially like the Lever bill, that the provisions of the Smith bill or the Lever bill are almost identical with the provisions of the Page bill, so far as college extension work is concerned.

If the bills were not substantially identical I could easily see the impropriety of my motion. But inasmuch as they are identical, or nearly so, and inasmuch as I believe the bill which I have introduced has been drawn with greater care and is better safeguarded than the amendment which was introduced here, as I understood, to meet a compromise, I now ask, because I believe it is the better bill, that the original bill be substituted.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PAGE. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to see if I am correct in my understanding. As I understand the Senator from Vermont, the practical difference is that the Lever bill provides for giving the franking privilege to the agricultural colleges and the schools that enjoy the benefit of these appropriations?

Mr. PAGE. An additional franking privilege.

Mr. BRISTOW. An additional franking privilege; and it also makes an appropriation from the Public Treasury which it does not require that the States shall meet with a like appropriation?

Mr. PAGE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator permit an interruption there?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It seems to me section 31 of the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont cures that defect, because it specifically provides that a double amount of money must be provided by State or local taxation. That is the amendment which has been adopted in Committee of the Whole, and which the Senator now proposes to substitute for his original bill, which in Committee of the Whole he voluntarily withdrew, and upon the strength of which withdrawal many votes were secured for the bill.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to correct the Senator, because I know he desires to be absolutely correct. I said that under the amendment of January 24, which I offered, I had not changed so much as a comma. The provisions of the Lever bill do not provide that an equal amount shall be appropriated by the States; and as I understand—and I think the Senator from Georgia will agree with me—as the bill will be left if we pass it to-day as it came from the Committee of the Whole, there will not be required from the States an amount equal to the amount appropriated by the Federal Government.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me ask the Senator another question. Will not the bill which has been agreed upon in Committee of the Whole contain section 31, offered by the Senator himself?

Mr. PAGE. I do not know that I have offered any amendment to section 31.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator withdrew his original bill, Senate bill No. 3, and offered as an amendment to the pending bill everything following section 9. It is that which we have been discussing and that which we have finally agreed upon in Committee of the Whole. Section 31 of that amendment contains this provision:

But there shall in no case be disbursed under the terms of this act to any school or college out of moneys derived from the rural school department fund, the industrial school fund, the agricultural school fund, the college teachers' training fund, or the teachers' training fund, as provided by this act, more money than 50 per cent of the amount which is supplied and expended during the same period for the same purpose for which such fund is to be expended out of either State and local or State or local public moneys.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, the trouble with the Senator's conclusion there is that the feature pertaining to the college extension fund is not included in that list.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, as to three-quarters of the expenditures provided for in this bill, the provision is at least good?

Mr. PAGE. It is good as to practically all except the Lever appropriation of $10,000 to the colleges. Under the Lever bill the appropriation of $10,000 per year to the colleges is not to be duplicated by the States, while under the Page bill it is to be duplicated. In that respect I think the Page bill is the better.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator gave the impression that under the bill agreed upon in Committee of the Whole there was no obligation upon the States or the local communities to supply an equal amount of money. But this provision evidently covers the case as to three-quarters of the amount appropriated, and it is only in the case of one appropriation where that provision is not made.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I desire to say that that was my understanding—that there was an appropriation in the bill as it was agreed to in the Committee of the Whole that the States were not required to meet with an equal amount. I did not understand that the States did not have to meet part of the appropriation, but that there was one appropriation which they did not have to meet, and that that was one of the differences.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But that was a matter which the Senator himself could have cured in Committee of the Whole, and can still cure by an amendment.

I want to renew my statement made a few minutes ago—that it seems to me, without any regard to a disagreement between the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Georgia, that the Senator from Vermont should in good faith carry out what he publicly agreed to here on the floor of the Senate on the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa. The Senator from Vermont used this language:

I will state my purpose in moving the amendment to the Lever bill, so called, H. R. 22871: For many months I have been trying to get action upon the original Senate bill No. 3. That action, as the junior Senator from Georgia well understands, has been postponed and objected to from time to time until he believes—and I do not know but that I agree with him in that belief—that to pass now the original bill, Senate bill No. 3, and send it to the House would probably mean that it would go into the Committee on Agriculture of that body, and that it would there die the death which comes to so many bills which we send over to the House toward the close of a session. * * * If we are at this session of Congress to grant Federal aid to industrial education, it must be done by substituting Senate bill No. 3 for the House bill. In other words, Senators who are in favor of extending industrial education to the boy as provided by Senate bill No. 3 must vote for the amendment which I have offered, for it is probable that in no other way can we reach this legislation at this session. If the amendment which I have offered substituting the Page bill for the Lever bill is adopted, then the matter goes into conference, and out of that conference it is believed some bill carrying with it a measure of Federal aid to industrial education will result.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator right there for just a moment? That is my position at this time—that in order to get action at this session we must substitute the Page bill for the Lever bill, because then it will go into conference, and from that conference we can get out some kind of a bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me to add a word, that was the Senator's original position. But about that time the Senator from Iowa took the floor, and suggested to the Senator from Vermont a method of simplifying the procedure by amalgamating the two bills. He did it in this way:

I think it would simplify matters very much if the Senator from Vermont would allow the bill presented by the Senator from Georgia to stand, inasmuch as he does not propose to change it, and simply offer as an amendment that part of his bill which deals with the vocational education and additional appropriations for agricultural education. I believe we would get along with it a little faster if that were done.

Then the Senator from Vermont said:

Mr. President, I am very anxious to adopt whatever is the best and most proper course here. My suggestion on the 24th instant was that I would offer the amendment which has been placed upon the desks of Senators this morning. But I recognize the fact that the Senator from Iowa is a warm friend of the whole measure, and I am rather inclined to accept his wishes and his views, if the Chair informs me that that is the proper parliamentary procedure.

Having given notice that I would introduce this amendment as a whole, I will ask, as a matter of parliamentary procedure, whether I may properly omit at this time from my proposed amendment the first nine sections, which really are identical with House bill No. 22871, and move to amend the House bill by adding to it all of that portion of the proposed amendment which follows section 9?

Thereupon the Chair naturally told the Senator from Vermont that it was his privilege to change his position, and he did change it. We accepted the change, and we discussed the matter with the understanding that he had abandoned the original bill. No study has been placed upon the original bill since that time. We on this side have believed, and have voted with the Senator from Vermont in the belief, that he had abandoned the original bill, and had agreed to accept the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa for the simplification of the matter.

It seems to me, after that has been done, that at least propriety, if not good faith, requires the Senator from Vermont to carry out the arrangement thus made in the open Senate.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PAGE. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am not much interested in the different processes and maneuvers that have been resorted to in order to get the bill up to the present stage, but I am interested in what the bill does.

If the amendment which the Senator from Vermont now offers changes the bill which we passed in the Committee of the Whole so as to limit the franking privilege instead of extending it, and so as to require the States to put up funds whenever the Federal Government does, I want to vote for those two propositions. I do not care what the different understandings or misunderstandings have been, but I am interested in the substance of the legislation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me, it would be an easy matter to amend the bill in that way, and I would be very glad to join him in that. But it would not be necessary, in order to accomplish that, to take up a completely new bill which the Senate has not even been considering as in Committee of the Whole, and which does contain other features.

Mr. BRISTOW. If there is any other feature, I should like to know what it is. I have been trying to find out the differences between the two measures. Up to this time these two differences have been suggested. Are there any others?

Mr. PAGE. There are. I should like to have Senators give their attention to this statement, because I know that upon this point there is considerable difference of opinion.

The Lever bill gives $10,000 a year to each State. That makes a total of $480,000. Senate bill No. 3, as drawn, gives $640,000. Touching that particular feature, I want to say that the head of one of the colleges in Mississippi came to me and said: "Senator PAGE, if you knew the struggle we are making in the South to get along and give the negroes of the South some education along industrial lines you would say that we should have $10,000 for each agricultural college rather than $10,000 for each State." In other words, in States that have two agricultural colleges they ask that we give an added $10,000.

That feature was objected to by some, including, I think, the junior Senator from Georgia. But after a time I went to him with statements from Senators from the South, and said: "Senator, there is a strong feeling on the part of some that the negro colleges in the South should share this appropriation with the white colleges." The Senator from Georgia said to me substantially this—I do not want to misquote him, but as nearly as I can remember he said: "If you want to give us that added $10,000, I do not think we will object to it." So the Page bill, as drawn, gives the same amount to the negro colleges of the South that it gives to the white colleges. In other words, it gives $160,000 more, being $10,000 for each State having a negro college.

The Senator from Kentucky came to me and pleaded for that provision. He said: "You do not know how much we in Kentucky need to give industrial education to the negroes. Will you not aid me to get that provision in?" I said: "So far as I am concerned, Senator, I do not want to do anything that will imperil my bill; but if the Senator from Georgia and those who objected agree I will agree." I supposed I had the consent of the Senator from Georgia, so far as he was concerned, that this $10,000 for the agricultural colleges should be included in my bill, and so it was put in. But it is omitted from the Lever bill.

I do not want to say which is right. I wish the Senate might decide upon that. But I want to say that that provision is exactly as it was left by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate. I do not feel at liberty to emasculate the bill by changing those features, unless it be to effect a compromise which will prevent any disastrous results to these two bills—the Lever bill and the Page bill.

If I supposed Senate bill No. 3 were going to be imperiled, every Senator here knows I would yield to any kind of a compromise. But the facts are that the Page bill and the Lever bill coincide; and when they get into conference we can, from those two measures, produce a bill that I believe will meet perfectly the views of the Senate and will be at least a start in the great plan of Federal aid to industrial education.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. PAGE. With pleasure.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to ask the Senator if he has any less reason to-day for believing that the measure will be imperiled by insisting on original Senate bill No. 3 than he had a few days ago, when this same matter was up, and when he then thought it wise, in order to accomplish definite results, to accept the Lever bill, and to add to it the provisions of his bill? The situation to-day is not at all different from what it was then, it seems to me.

Let me say to the Senator that from the time he introduced the bill and I first gave it consideration I have been an advocate of Senate bill No. 3, known as the Page bill. I have been under the general impression that it included to a very large degree, and in a general way, the provisions of the House bill known as the Lever bill, and that it went still further. Believing, as I always have, that the great Department of Agriculture of our Government has for its chief function that of education, I have heartily favored the assistance provided in educational directions by both the Lever bill and Senate bill No. 3.

But there seems to be a difference of opinion as to whether or not the provisions covering that particular subject in Senate bill No. 3 are substantially the same as the provisions in what is known as the Lever bill that has passed the House. In order to avoid any difficulty on that score, particularly as long as the Senator has just reiterated what he has said over and over again—that his bill contains substantially the same provisions as the Lever bill—it seems to me that it is the safer proposition to accept the House bill and to add to it such provisions as we have agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, which provisions are the work and have been prepared under the direction and guidance of the Senator from Vermont.

There would then go to the conferees the measure as it passed the House, with certain additions; and it would be for them to determine which of those additions, if any, they would agree upon; and if they did not agree upon any of the additions, we would at least get a measure which has already passed the House, and which would then become a law. I appeal to the Senator——

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida if he has the slightest doubt that the bill, as I propose to amend it, would be the subject of a conference on the Lever bill, just as certainly as the Lever bill amended by the additional features of the Page bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. I confess, Mr. President, that in my judgment the measure would not then be in nearly so favorable a position, looking to definite results, as it would be if the Senator would accept the situation as it comes from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to know why, Mr. President.

Mr. FLETCHER. Because there would go to the House an entirely new bill, not the Lever bill as it passed the House at all, not the Lever bill with amendments which are merely additions to the Lever bill. There would go to the House an entirely different measure, embodying different and varying propositions, which would be referred there to the conferees, and it would have to be all thrashed out over again. Delay would necessarily ensue; and in my judgment there would be very serious doubt about it ever coming to any result at this session of Congress if that should be done.

As a friend of the measure, originally known as Senate bill No. 3, as a friend of both these propositions, I most respectfully urge upon the Senator from Vermont to leave this matter as it came from the Committee of the Whole.

I am not quite clear in my own mind about it, although it has been assumed in debate here, but I understand that the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont on the 24th of January is now before the Senate as a part——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It has been adopted.

Mr. FLETCHER. It has been adopted; and although my recollection was that the Senator offered to withdraw that amendment in Committee of the Whole, I was not quite sure whether he did it or not. There was some confusion at the time.

Mr. PAGE. No; I did not.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator understand that his amendment offered on the 24th of January is the matter now before the Senate?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. PAGE. I should like to answer the Senator from Florida for just a moment. Then I shall be very glad to yield the floor to the Senator from Mississippi.

I made concessions, Mr. President, which I did not believe improved the bill. I believe the bill as it was originally drawn is a great deal the better bill. I have submitted my reasons for believing it is the better bill. When I consented to introduce the amendment of January 24, it was with the full expectation that I had reached a compromise, and that as a result of making the surrender and reaching a compromise we would have no opposition to the bill.

But the Senator will remember that all the afternoon objection after objection came up to the bill. So, finally, I feel, and I think the Senator will feel for me, that I have a right to say that now I should prefer to have the better and the stronger bill go to conference. If I thought it could not go into conference—if that is the parliamentary situation, and I am assured that it is by good parliamentarians—I should not object to anything. I want it to go to conference.

The language which I used, and which the Senator from Nebraska has quoted, conveys my exact sentiments. If I thought the bill could not go to conference, I would yield almost anything. But I am told that it can go to conference under the amendment I have offered, and believing that my last amendment is the better amendment, and that it more nearly perfects the bill, I should like to have it go in that way.

I believe that in the amendments that were hastily prepared to meet the views of the Senator from Georgia there were some things that were drawn too hastily. We have found now some very important defects in them. But the original bill, I believe, is perfect, so far as that is concerned. I believe every matter of technical language has been carefully provided for. It has been submitted to the best technicians I know in that line, and the bill has been approved by the educators of the country in the form in which I now ask it to go through. I hope Senators will not object to supporting my amendment, for I believe I have the better bill now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator continues to repeat that he introduced his amendment under a misapprehension, believing that a compromise had been reached. I desire to state that if he understood that agreement was by me he understood it in spite of the fact that I told him expressly that I would not agree to it. Nothing that I said justified him in believing that I intended to support it. I declined to agree to support it when the Senator came to my house. I told him as he left my house that I could not agree in advance to support it. I told him before he introduced it here that I had not agreed to support it.

I am a little weary of hearing upon the floor that the Senator introduced it under a misapprehension, if he means to refer to myself, as I have told him that I had not agreed to it often enough to exclude the justification of a misapprehension.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I did not mean to say that the Senator had told me one thing or the other. I simply say, and I repeat it, that I supposed the Senator and myself had reached an agreement. It seems that I am wrong about it, so I do not reiterate that. I simply say that acting upon that supposition I introduced my amendment of January 24. Had I not supposed that we had reached an agreement, I should not have introduced it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, after we came into the Senate the Senator from Vermont introduced the amendment, knowing that I did not agree to it. He continued to press it here, knowing that I did not agree to it. He accepted the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], knowing that I had not agreed to it. I stated on the floor, in reply to a question of the Senator from Iowa, that I could not agree to it. I finally went a great deal further in agreeing to it in my votes to-day than I thought I could at the time it was introduced.

I have been trying to help to-day to get the measure into such a shape that we could pass something. If the Senator persists, I think perhaps the whole thing had better go over for the session, and let us start over again at the next session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am afraid there is a good deal of amour propre on both sides of this matter. I take it that what the Senate is seeking is results, and not names, and yet now and then names have a great deal to do with things.

I know something about the procedure at the other end of the Capitol. The two Houses will be further apart, actually as well as nominally, if it is announced to the 400 Members of the House of Representatives—a body so numerous that they have not time to study all questions in detail—that the Senate has rejected the House bill, and has substituted for it the Senate bill. Immediately they will say to one another: "What do you know about the Page bill?" "Not much; virtually nothing." "Our bill was considered in committee. What course shall we take?" Immediately it will be concluded that the best course will be to send the bill to the Committee on Agriculture of the House, in order that that committee may study the bill and report it back to the House with some enlightening information as to the differences between the two bills.

This is a very small body, composed of ninety-odd Members. Yet, to-day, we have seen the best-informed Senators on the floor rise and ask for information as to the difference between two bills which have been pending here for—I will not undertake to say how long. There is the real danger in this situation.

Of course, I understand, and everybody understands, how two very honorable men may meet and discuss matters, and one may say: "I am of the opinion that this ought to be done." The other one says: "I do not know but that I could agree with you about that." The first one says: "I think this ought to be done." Then the other, having heard what the first is willing to concede, will say: "I will agree to that." When you get through you have a mutual misunderstanding; and yet both part with no agreement on the part of either to do precisely what the other desires. In fact, I think it is well, when men meet together and begin to talk about a difference, to remember always that the conversation, as a rule, is tentative.

I ask the attention of the Senator from Vermont. I am not asking him a question, but I am afraid if you go to the House of Representatives, as numerous a body as it is, as crowded with all sorts of business as it is, four times as much crowded as we are in every way, and say to them that you have substituted for a House bill a Senate bill, unless you are able to say to them that the Senate bill is identical with the House bill or identical except for immaterial variations, the course taken by the House would be to send the bill to the committee instead of sending it at once to conference. We are within 30 or 35 days of adjournment, and I do not believe I would take that chance. The point I want to make is that the two Houses will be further apart actually, because they are nominally further apart, if you take that course.

I confess with some degree of shame that I have had my mind lately dwelling more upon some other matters than upon this measure, and I really do not know just how far the Committee of the Whole adopted the provisions of the Lever bill and the provisions of the Page bill, but if they have substantially included the essential parts of both bills in one bill, then I have no doubt about the fact that the prospect of securing actual legislation would be much better if the matter were sent to the House in that way.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was out of the Senate when the motion was made. Is this a motion to substitute, striking out all after the enacting clause?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the method of doing business in the Senate he understands better than I. We have nothing before us immediately, but the Senator from Vermont gave notice, I understand, that when the bill got into the Senate——

Mr. LODGE. We are in the Senate now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He would substitute the Page bill for the Lever bill.

Mr. LODGE. We are in the Senate now, but what I wanted information about, because I was out of the Chamber, was the question whether the motion is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Page bill.

Mr. LODGE. If that is the motion, of course that takes both bills into conference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course it does.

Mr. LODGE. It retains the House number.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon; it takes both bills into conference under the House rules unless a motion is made and carried to send it to the Committee on Agriculture. If you take 400 men and they do not know what the Senate bill is, they are not going to rush it into conference. A conference in the Senate is bad enough, but a conference at the other end is worse, because there are 400 Members; things have to be understood, have to be explained to them, and men are not willing to take up an entirely new bill and have it voted upon under a proposition that on amendment numbered 5 of the Senate the House conferees disagreed, and on amendment numbered 3 the House conferees agree, and so on. The House insists upon keeping its business in its own hands upon a few occasions when it can, and when a matter goes to conference it really can not do so.

Mr. LODGE. I thought from what the Senator said the motion was to substitute the Senate bill. If it were substituting the Senate bill for the House bill, it would go back as a Senate bill with the Senate number, and of course it would go to the committee and would not go into conference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is a distinction, but it is not a difference, and it is the difference to which the House will, in my opinion, pay attention, not the mere distinction.

Mr. LODGE. But I mean if it was a substitution, then it would go back, of course, as a Senate bill, and would go to the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. By striking out all after the enacting clause it would be a Senate bill with a House number.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So, when it goes back to the House from the Senate and the Senate has stricken out all of the House bill except the enacting clause and substituted for it a Senate bill, unless you can assure the parties in charge of the bill, and not only can but are willing to assure the House, that the two bills are either identical or there are immaterial differences, the Members of the House will want to have it examined by a House committee. They are not willing to act merely upon the deliberations of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Mississippi if the 400 Members of the House will feel that they know anything more about the Page amendment when it is put in divers amendments, as it has been in Committee of the Whole already, than when put in a single amendment in the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Absolutely they will, because, in the first place, they have been discussing one bill, and whether they will know or not, they will think they know. This is a psychological problem, and they will think they know, and thinking that the House bill has come back passed by the Senate with certain amendments, they will be willing to let the House bill go to the conferees in order that the differences between the two Houses concerning the amendments may be settled. In other words, the essential thing in their minds is, if the House bill is passed, then there will be no trouble about sending it to conference at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert a substitute.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I then vote against the proposition now before the Senate made by the Senator from Vermont, and I desire to state very briefly why I will do it.

I have been for the Senate bill, prepared in a large measure by the Senator from Vermont, and for which he is entitled to the greatest possible credit from the beginning until he entered upon this discussion. I think it was I who first suggested to the Senator from Vermont that in order to make certain of some legislation upon the subject he offer Senate bill No. 3 as a substitute when the House bill came before the Senate.

I know nothing about the conference between the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Georgia, and I do not care to inquire into it. I only know that at one time the Senator from Vermont stated that he understood they had reached an agreement, and that the Senator from Georgia rejected that construction of their conference. My interest in this special matter was after that time, after the Senator from Georgia had indicated that he had entered into no agreement with the Senator from Vermont, after we all understood that the Senator from Vermont offered the substitute which bears the date of January 24, 1913. That substitute is a reproduction in its first nine sections of the House bill. There is no change whatsoever. The remaining sections are a reproduction of Senate bill No. 3, with the changes that had been made by the Senator from Vermont at the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia. He so declared.

I was intensely anxious that nothing should happen that would impair the chance for successful legislation, and therefore when the Senator from Georgia arose and said to the Senator from Vermont that he hoped he would offer that part of his substitute beginning with section No. 10 as an addition to the House bill, the House bill having been reproduced in terms in the first nine sections of the substitute in the hands of the Senator from Vermont, it seemed to me that we would be surer of that legislation if the suggestions of the Senator from Georgia were accepted, and I arose, caring not a whit whether the legislation came from the House or whether it came from the Senate. It makes no difference to me where it originates or who originates it. I simply desire the legislation itself. It seemed to me that the easiest and the surest way of reaching our end was to attach what might be called the Page part of this legislation to the Lever part of the legislation, if I may so designate a House bill and a Senate bill. I so declared, and expressed the hope that the Senator from Vermont would adopt that course.

The Senator from Vermont did adopt that course, and so declared from his seat. He not only so declared, but he did offer these parts of his bill from section 10 through to the end as an amendment to the House bill. I know that he did that in perfect good faith. I know that he has but one desire, and that is to secure wise legislation upon this subject. But having embarked upon this course at my suggestion, he may feel himself at liberty to depart from that course, but I do not. I think we ought to adhere to the plan which resulted in the offer of the sections after No. 10 of the Senate bill. I believe so because there is a certain good faith which requires us to adhere to that course, and, second, because I believe it will tend to allay the irritation which little by little is creeping into the Senate upon the whole matter.

I sincerely hope that the Senator from Vermont will not persist in offering the original bill as a substitute, if you please, for the House bill, but will be content to pursue the course which was adopted day before yesterday and which has already had results so gratifying to every friend of both agricultural and vocational education.

I must not be understood by this as meaning to say that there are not certain parts of the Lever bill, so called, rather objectionable to me. I think there ought to be some amendments, and we ought to make them now. I happened to be out of the Senate for a moment, and I did not dream that the amendment would be adopted so quickly and that the bill would pass from the Committee of the Whole into the Senate, or I would have suggested certain amendments. I do not believe at all in the extension of the franking privilege. That is a matter which is very easily corrected by a simple amendment. Striking out half a dozen lines in the House bill will correct that error, if it be an error, as I think it is.

Again, I agree with the Senator from Vermont that each State ought to duplicate the contribution of $10,000 per year, as well as the additional sums that come in year after year. I think it would deepen their sense of responsibility, and it would be more in harmony with the entire structure of the House bill. But those are mere matters of detail that can be very easily corrected.

Again, there will have to be certain amendments made in the bill as it is now in the Senate. Day before yesterday section No. 10, as it appeared in the original bill offered, was stricken out upon my motion, and the language found in section 3 of the Senate bill was inserted in its stead. That makes a difference in certain phraseology throughout the whole bill, as the Senator from Vermont will assure the Senate. I think in half a dozen sections of the bill there recurs the words "rural-school fund," and after the adoption of my amendment there will be no rural-school fund. Wherever those words occur they must be stricken out and the words "secondary-school fund" must be substituted.

Mr. PAGE. If the Senator will allow me, the original Senate bill No. 3 is as the Senator from Iowa desires it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. PAGE. It says "secondary schools, or schools of secondary grade, or high schools" shall mean schools offering courses in advance of the elementary schools, and so forth.

Mr. CUMMINS. But nowhere is it called a rural school.

Mr. PAGE. Not in the original Senate bill No. 3.

Mr. CUMMINS. Inasmuch as the original section has been now restored, the original phraseology describing it must be also restored.

I rather think that the Senator from Vermont did not benefit what might be called his part of the bill by trying to weave into it the suggestions of the Senator from Georgia. They do not fit very well, in my opinion, and I would be very glad if he could take the old Senate bill, with the exception of section 7, and offer it. I have no objection to that, but I do object, in view of everything that has occurred, to changing the whole course of procedure and now attempting to eliminate the House bill by substituting for it another measure. I would have been perfectly willing to have pursued that course had not the incident occurred which did occur here day before yesterday. I shall therefore vote against the proposed substitution by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE and Mr. BRISTOW addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PAGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand that the bill as it is now before the Senate can be amended or perfected before the substitute amendment is voted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unquestionably.

Mr. BRISTOW. I therefore move to strike out section 3 of the bill as it is now before the Senate. It is the section that relates to the franking privilege, beginning on line 22, page 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out from the House bill section 3, which reads as follows:

That all correspondence for the furtherance of the purposes of this act issued from the agricultural colleges to their agents, or by the agents of the said extension departments thereof receiving the benefits of this act, shall be transmitted in the mails of the United States free of charge for postage, under such regulations as the Postmaster General from time to time may prescribe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves to strike out the section just read. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think that section ought to be stricken from the bill. It is perfectly easy to make an allowance in their accounts to the agents in the field or to the colleges to be paid from the fund. The amount will not be large. But if you open this service to the franking privilege, you open a door to a great deal of misuse of the mails. It is almost impossible to keep the franking privilege within the proper limitations. I certainly think that a general provision like this for the franking privilege is a very mistaken one, and I hope it will be stricken from the bill before we vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRISTOW. I offer further to amend, on page 4, by striking out in line 7 after "part" the words "its allotment" and insert "any"; and also by striking out the word "additional" in line 8, so that it will read:

That no State shall be entitled to any part of any of these sums unless its legislature has heretofore provided, etc.

That makes the State appropriate an equal amount with the Federal Government of all the sums.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will not resist that motion, but I will state to the Senate the reason why this fixed sum was given. It was thought that some of the States, the smaller States, ought to have a fixed sum, and that is the theory upon which it was put in. So far as my own State is concerned and those I am especially interested in, they are perfectly ready to meet any sum the Government gives. I have no authority to consent to it, but I shall not oppose that amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. The reason why I proposed the amendment was that this is, of course, an aid to the States, and the aid is offered for two reasons. As I understand it, first it appropriates money from the General Treasury for that purpose, and that appropriation is used to encourage the States to appropriate their own money to carry on the work; so we not only appropriate the money that they will get the direct benefit from, but we induce the States to engage with the Government in this worthy cause by meeting the appropriation. I think it is nothing but just.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the Senator takes his seat, do I understand that this is to strike out the provision which gives $10,000 to each State unless the State duplicates the $10,000?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; it requires the States to duplicate the $10,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This bill, I understand, was drawn up upon a principle somewhat like the compromise giving each State two Senators and Representatives according to population. In other words, it was a compromise between territoriality and population and wealth. So it was concluded to give $10,000 to each State to start with, regardless of wealth or poverty or the size of the State, and then for the balance of the appropriations, for the most part it was given in proportion to wealth; that is to say, it was given upon condition that the State should duplicate the amount which the Federal Government gave.

Whether there be a State in the Union which could not duplicate the $10,000 or not I do not know. Nor does that interfere with the general principle at stake. If there be such a State, it ought not to be left out entirely. If there be not such a State, then all the States stand equally as regards the $10,000. It does not seem to me that that provision ought to be stricken out. It might very well happen that a perfectly new State might be bound up with the expenses of its new birth and everything else and be embarrassed about money.

The Senator from Kansas has said that the object of this was to aid the States in doing certain work for the people. The primary object, I take it, is to aid the people, and to leave the people without aid because the State could not help them does not seem to me to be right.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "of its allotment," and, in line 9, strike out the word "additional," so that if amended the proviso will read:

Provided further, That no State shall be entitled to any part of these sums unless its legislature has heretofore provided or until it shall provide, etc.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Kansas an additional reason that I recall now which was given for this appropriation to each State. It was that it guaranteed the immediate beginning of work everywhere without reference to appropriations, to give to each one of the States a demonstration of its value, and it would thereby lead the States to make the appropriations to call for the additional sums. I rather think that it is a desirable part of the bill.

Mr. BRISTOW. It seems to me that when the Federal Government proposes to aid the States in their educational development, this is going a good ways from our old idea. We are appropriating money for educational purposes to the various States, and it appears to me it is certainly good policy to require the various States to make an appropriation to meet that.

The objection has been made to meet that that this will fall more heavily upon the small States than the large States, a State of half a million of population as compared with a State of 5,000,000 population. But $10,000 for the educational benefit of a half million people is a great deal larger proportionate contribution to the educational facilities of that State than if the State had 5,000,000 people.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will permit me an interruption, I think he is in error there. Territoriality has something to do with it. You may give a State, if it is a large State, with a sparse population, a certain sum of money to be expended for a certain purpose and it will not benefit it near so much as it would benefit a State of the same population with one-tenth of that area.

That reminds me of another defect in this bill. It says, for example, that there shall not be above one agricultural high school for five counties. Of course that is easy in the thickly settled Northeast, but without going down to Texas or Arizona, stopping at Mississippi on the way, five counties in my State, of which my own county would be a center, and Washington and Holmes and Hinds and Warren, the surrounding counties, would about duplicate the area of the State of Connecticut. So you have a high school there, with the people to attend it about five times as far, do you not understand? So they must go and board in order to get the same benefit that would be gotten in Rhode Island from taking the family buggy and driving in every day.

I am merely using that as an illustration just at present; but the assumption that just because a thing is a territorial area and called a State, it could get the same benefit from $10,000 which a smaller and more compact area could get with many more children enjoying the privilege, is a mistake.

Mr. BRISTOW. It seems to me that, if the Federal Government is going to appropriate money for the educational facilities of the State, it is nothing but fair that the State should be required to meet that appropriation by an equal amount of its own funds.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me ask the Senator one more question, and then I shall not disturb him further: Is the purpose of the bill to help the States or to help the people?

Mr. BRISTOW. It is to help both—to help the people and to help the States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I take it that the object and the purpose of the bill is not to help the political entity that we call a State, but that it is to help the citizens of the United States in acquiring a vocational and agricultural education.

Mr. BRISTOW. The educational system of the country has been in charge of the States. We have not launched out until this time upon any great national educational system. There are a great many people who question the wisdom of it. Now, certainly I question the wisdom of the Government making an appropriation direct to the States for educational purposes. I may consent to an appropriation, provided the State will provide an equal amount, the purpose being to encourage the establishment of proper educational facilities in all the States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will permit me to break a promise so recently made, I will say that I agree with the Senator, of course, that the instrumentality, the trustee in a certain sense, is the State; but, after all, the beneficiaries are the children of the people in the States operating from the Federal Government through the States.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I do not want to take the time of the Senate any further on this question. I wish the Senate, if they are so inclined, to strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute Senate bill No. 3——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. PAGE. I beg pardon; I thought the Senator from Kansas had yielded the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I ask that the question be put on my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Kansas. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let us have the yeas and nays on that, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WETMORE (when Mr. LIPPITT'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. LIPPITT] has a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA].

Mr. RICHARDSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I wish to transfer the general pair which I have with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OLIVER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I wish to transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. OWEN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to my colleague [Mr. GORE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (after having voted in the affirmative). The occupant of the chair is paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. As that Senator has not voted, the vote is withdrawn.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] did not vote. I have a pair with that Senator, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—40.

Bourne	Cummins	Kern	Perkins
Bradley	Dillingham	La Follette	Poindexter
Brandegee	Dixon	Lodge	Pomerene

So Mr. BRISTOW's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer a series of amendments which are purely formal. The Senate has adopted section 3 of the Senate bill as now section 10 of the bill before the Senate. In that section the words used are "secondary schools" and not "rural schools." I therefore move to strike out the words "rural schools," where they are found; and I ask unanimous consent that it may be done without pointing out the line of each amendment where those words occur in sections 15, 16, 19, 20, 24, 25, 26, 28, and 33, and to substitute in each instance the words "secondary schools."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Wherever the words "rural schools" appear in sections 15, 16, 19, 20, 24, 25, 26, 28, and 33, they shall be stricken out and the words "secondary schools" substituted therefor.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I rather hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa may be adopted, although I want to state here and now that there have been, I will not say a multitude of amendments, but a great many amendments made to this bill, so that the bill is almost ridiculous in its make-up, if we take it in its present form. For instance, we have changed it, I think, by adding after the word "States" the words "and Territories." The bill from first to last has been drawn with particular reference to States, and I do not believe it will articulate with the Territorial laws. It is true that you have amended the Lever bill, so called, in two very important particulars to-day; you have, by a very decided vote, stricken out that feature which gave the States $10,000 each without the States paying another $10,000, and you have stricken out the feature giving them the franking privilege.

Now, I want to terminate this debate, so far as I am concerned, by saying that it is not exceedingly material whether you do or do not adopt the amendment which I am about to offer. I am simply going to add that I believe that if we take the Page bill in its entirety, we shall have a perfected bill, while, if we take the bill which we have amended so hastily, we shall get a bill that is full of incongruities.

In closing let me simply add that I hope the friends of Senate bill 3 will feel that, all things considered, it is wise to adopt the amendment which I have suggested, but there will be no broken hearts if this is not done. I believe it should be done, because I think Senate bill 3 is the better bill, but whatever the vote of the Senate may be I shall be satisfied.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I desire to say that at the last session the Page bill was presented to me. I examined it quite thoroughly, and was convinced of the wisdom and the propriety of the measure. After that I received very many letters—nearly 200, as I recall—from a great many educational institutions in New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania urging its passage. I pledged myself to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] that I would stand by him. I voted for the proposition that was suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]; but since it has been deemed best and wisest upon the part of the Senator from Vermont to urge the passage of his bill, in this controversy I will square myself with my agreement though the heavens fall. I am going to stand by the bill of the Senator from Vermont.

I want to vote for some measure that will tend to dignify labor. The whole trend of the times has been in contradiction to the man or the woman who works with his or her hands. Every effort has been made to hold up to the average young man the idea of being a lawyer, a doctor, or a theologian; the idea has been instilled into him that a profession should be his chief ambition in life. I want to do what little I can to dignify labor and induce men to labor. It is all very well in the clamor of the day to urge the youth of the land to stay on the farm; but the disposition of the country has been to ignore the farm boy, to frown on him with sneers and sundry little innuendoes aggravating to the sensitive mind. This has driven myriads of boys from the farm. I shall vote with the greatest pleasure and the greatest relish for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have listened to this discussion and have been considering at different times the bill in charge of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] for a great many months, and I think I am somewhat familiar with it. As I understand, the only objection to passing the substitute is the parliamentary situation, and possibly some agreement which seems to have been rather unilateral, the minds of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] never having met in a common understanding in regard to it. Aside from that, no one questions that the so-called Page bill contains all the features of the Lever bill. I have heard nobody dispute that proposition.

Senators say that possibly the measure will have a different standing before the other House if we pass the House bill as it has been amended instead of the Page bill. I am somewhat familiar with the procedure in the House, and I can not understand that there are any more difficulties attaching to the proposed substitute than will attend the bill as we have already amended it. It has been amended and will go to conference or to a committee of the other House. It will have to go to a committee according to the argument of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], because it materially changes the House bill. This does not necessarily follow and probably it will not.

So far as I am concerned, if I were to consider the parliamentary situation and were to be governed entirely by the effect either upon the other House or upon this, the question would be decided in my mind by the fact that the Senator from Vermont has had charge of this bill and has pressed it in season and out for many months, yielding too frequently, as it seems to me, to the requests of Senators, in order that they might place something in its stead. Further, if I understand aright, up until the day before yesterday this bill has been as much discussed as has the Lever bill and is better understood in the Senate. So it occurs to me that we can accomplish all that all Senators want, so far as legislation is concerned, if the House bill be amended by substituting after the enacting clause the Page bill, which, I repeat, contains everything that is in the Lever bill and is drawn with greater care. Its author has deliberated upon it for months; it has profited by the work of experts and is clear and harmonious in its terms. On the other hand, I venture to state that few Senators understand just what has been done by the Senate to the House bill. We know it has been changed day after day, here a little and there a little, but I feel sure that no one knows exactly what the bill is or whether it has been properly constructed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will permit me, why does he think so? It never was submitted to a committee; it has never been before the Agricultural Committee at all; and it has never been scrutinized line by line or section by section by the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Which bill has not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Page bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Page bill has been presented to the Senate from the Committee on Agriculture and was discussed by the Senator from Vermont for several days, as I remember. It has been generally understood and discussed throughout the country. I have known few bills that have seemed to excite more interest and more attention than has the Page bill. The people understand it; and I confess, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I understand it much better than I do the Lever bill as it has been amended up to this moment. I quite agree with the Senator from Vermont that if we pass the Lever bill to-day possibly we may pass something that we do not understand. Few Senators know just what we have done and the parts of the bill may be inharmonious. I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont a question which has been suggested to me by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. Was his bill before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate?

Mr. PAGE. Of course, we have discussed this matter a long time in the Senate, and I supposed that every feature had been before the committee. It may be, however, that there have been some amendments made in the Senate which were never considered by the committee; but the bill has been before the committee and has been considered in all its essential features.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understand, then, that Senate bill No. 3 has been considered by the committee?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes; and it has been reported.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not like to yield until I get an answer from the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. It has been reported.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then, it went to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, did it not?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And was reported by that committee?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator allow me a word there?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should like to have that question answered.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and was a member of the subcommittee which considered the Page bill. We had hearings on the substance of this bill, not in the technical form in which it is here now, but the entire scope of this bill, the agricultural features and the vocational educational features of it, were considered. Representatives from the leading colleges of the United States, both agricultural colleges and universities, came to Washington on two different occasions, and I remember that we had hearings which extended over several days and that a report was submitted by the Senator from Vermont to the full Committee on Agriculture and Forestry—a most exhaustive report upon the different features of this bill, the committee having given him authority to collect the information. This proposed legislation is the result of all that. I doubt if during the last two years there has come before the Senate a bill that was the subject of more extensive preliminary investigation and work and the subject of a larger correspondence with educational leaders of this country than the Page bill which is now before the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Now, let me ask the Senator from Vermont directly, Is it not true that Senate bill No. 3 was considered by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and through the Senator from Vermont reported to the Senate?

Mr. PAGE. It was.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PAGE. In just a moment.

Mr. BURNHAM. I merely want to corroborate the statement of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]. That is all I care to say.

Mr. PAGE. The bill was reported to the Senate, but subsequently was redrafted in some minor particulars. I asked unanimous consent of the Senate that the redrafted bill might be substituted in place of the bill originally reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and that unanimous consent was given.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I have both the bills here. The one which was passed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is 16 pages long, while the bill subsequently presented and now being considered is 28 pages long; so that the second bill can not be exactly the same measure.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I hold in my hand Senate bill No. 3, Calendar No. 348, upon which I find the following notation:

In the Senate of the United States.

April 6, 1911. Mr. PAGE introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.
February 26, 1912. Reported by Mr. PAGE, with amendments.
June 14, 1912. By unanimous consent the text of original bill and reported amendments withdrawn, and substitute reported, placed on calendar, and printed in roman.
July 24, 1912. Ordered reprinted as agreed to in Committee of the Whole; all in roman.

That is the record of the bill as it appears here on the desks of Senators.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to propound an inquiry to the Senator from Georgia? I did not understand his reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. Do I understand, then, that the bill now offered as an amendment, consisting of 28 pages, has never been considered by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Unquestionably it has never been before the Agricultural Committee at all.

Mr. SWANSON. Not before a committee of the Senate for consideration at all?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The first Senate bill, No. 3, 16 pages long, was passed on and reported by the Agricultural Committee. After that was submitted to the Senate the Senator from Vermont redrafted his bill, and the bill now presented, 28 pages long, has never been before the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is the Senator——

Mr. SWANSON. And my inquiry——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Just a moment. Is the Senator from Georgia on the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then I take it the Senator from Georgia gave his consent that the original bill and reported amendments should be withdrawn and the substitute, as presented by the Senator from Vermont, should stand in place of the bill as reported by him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My statement was that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry had not examined and passed upon that bill. My consent was no more than the consent of each other Senator. The Senator from Vermont had charge of the matter. He referred to it as his bill, and it was his bill, and when he asked to present a substitute we all consented. The Senator from Michigan consented just as I did; but the bill did not go back to the Committee on Agriculture. It was the Committee of the Whole Senate that consented to the substitution.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not complaining about it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My only point was that the bill of 28 pages has never been considered in detail by the Senate and has never been considered in detail by the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. Right there let me ask the Senator from Georgia a question, with the consent of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. My question is as to whether or not the extra pages are not made up of the Lever bill, which is now attached to the Page bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all; no. The portion of the bill which is similar to the Lever bill is exactly the same in the first bill of 16 pages and in the second bill of 28 pages. There are a number of quite substantial changes in the two bills. The new bill, which was presented with the 28 pages in it, has quite a number of features different from the old bill of 16 pages which the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry approved.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think two things are undisputed at the present time, namely, that the pending bill, the Lever bill as it has been amended, contains the provisions of the Lever bill and also practically all that was contained in the Page bill. On the other hand, the Page amendment contains practically everything that was in the Page bill, and also all of the principal provisions of the Lever bill. Whichever way we vote, we are practically passing the same bill, whether we adopt the Page amendment to the Lever bill, or amend the Lever bill by inserting the Page bill as a substitute.

My vote is going to be governed by this consideration: The Senator from Vermont has had this bill before the Senate for at least two years. He has devoted a great deal of study to it. Instead of having a proposition now which comes in the shape of divers amendments attached in different ways, he has the same proposition drawn up logically, properly, and in its order; and it is known as the Page bill. So that practically it is a question whether we will adopt the bill that has the name of a Member of the House attached to it, or the name of the Senator from Vermont. That is practically all there is to it now. Considering the length of time we have had the Page bill before us, I stand ready to give my colleague the compliment of voting that his bill shall be passed by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the parliamentary situation as the Chair understands it.

Sundry amendments have been agreed to as in Committee of the Whole. The question is, the bill having been reported to the Senate, whether or not the Senate shall concur in those amendments. The Senator from Vermont proposes before that action is taken to strike out and insert. The Chair thinks that can not be done, but that the question should first be put upon concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, for the reason that any Senator can ask for a separate vote upon any amendment agreed to. So that, whether or not the amendments agreed to as in Committee of the Whole are concurred in in the Senate, the Senator from Vermont can then offer his substitute.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, can the Senator from Vermont offer a substitute after the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole have been concurred in in the Senate? I venture to suggest that the point at which he must offer his substitute is before we pass in the Senate on the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. That is, he must offer it as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why can not the Senator from Vermont offer his substitute for the original bill after the original bill has been perfected by the amendments which the Senate has adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that that can be done.

Mr. LODGE. It can be done in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments agreed to as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LODGE. It occurred to me that under our usual practice, after amendments made as in Committee of the Whole had been concurred in in the Senate, it would be impossible then for the Senate to vote out those amendments, because they would have been adopted both as in Committee of the Whole and in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks a motion to strike out the entire bill and insert would be in order.

The question now is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I now move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the amendment which was offered by me on the 17th of January, which is identical with Senate bill No. 3, reported to the Senate June 14, 1912. It is what is known as the Page bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment, and read to the end of section 5, on page 5.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if it is in order, I move to dispense with the further reading of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can ask unanimous consent that the further reading be dispensed with.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. What is the question?

Mr. LODGE. The question is on substituting the Page bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. The vote is being taken on the question of substituting the Page bill?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GARDNER (when his name was called). Notwithstanding my pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE] on the pending measure, I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. JACKSON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. RICHARDSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and I withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I wish to transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] and vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULBERSON (after having voted in the negative). I will ask if the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that Senator has not voted.

Mr. CULBERSON. I transfer my general pair with that Senator to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and will allow my vote to stand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair is paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], and for that reason withholds his vote.

Mr. PERKINS. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMOOT. I was requested to announce that the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] is paired with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]; that the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; and that the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON] is paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS].

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—31.

So Mr. PAGE's amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 30, 1913, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 29, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, our heavenly Father, in whom we live and move and have our being, we realize that we are involved in a moral order which Thou hast ordained; that we can do nothing without Thee; yet we may set ourselves against that order and bring harm to ourselves and others; hence we pray for wisdom to guide us, strength to sustain us in a willingness to work with Thee, that we may hasten the coming of Thy kingdom upon the earth. And Glory and honor and praise be Thine forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as this is Calendar Wednesday, I desire to ask unanimous consent that I may move to elect three or four gentlemen to fill vacancies on committees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to nominate certain gentlemen to fill vacancies on committees.

Mr. MANN. I assume that this will take no time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. None at all. There is no contest about it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, for the Committee on Ways and Means, I wish to make the following nominations to fill existing committee vacancies:

Hon. JOHN H. ROTHERMEL to the vacancy on the Appropriations Committee occasioned by the death of Hon. J. G. McHenry.

Hon. GEORGE WHITE to the vacancy on the Appropriations Committee occasioned by the resignation of Hon. James Cox.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS to the chairmanship of the Public Lands Committee occasioned by the resignation of Hon. Joseph T. Robinson.

Hon. C. B. SMITH to the vacancy on the Foreign Affairs Committee occasioned by the resignation of Hon. William Sulzer.

The SPEAKER. Are there any other nominations? If not, the question is on the election of those nominated by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The question was taken, and the above-named Members were elected.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURLESON, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 28499) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, which was read the first and second times, and with the accompanying report (No. 1413), ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that I will call this bill up immediately after the passage of the fortifications bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not object to the presentation of the bill, but I wish to reserve all points of order upon the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 39.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return the bill (S. 7162) to amend section 801 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 24194. An act to create a new division of the western judicial district of Texas, and to provide for terms of court at Pecos, Tex., and for other purposes; and

H. R. 18841. An act incorporating the National Institute of Arts and Letters.

TIME OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the call rests on the Committee on the Library.

LINCOLN MEMORIAL.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on the Library to call up Senate joint resolution 158.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 158) approving the plan, design, and location for a Lincoln memorial.

Resolved, etc., That the plan, design, and location for a Lincoln memorial, determined upon and recommended to Congress December 4, 1912, by the commission created by the act entitled "An act to provide a commission to secure plans and designs for a monument or memorial to the memory of Abraham Lincoln," approved February 9, 1911, be, and the same are hereby, approved.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, we have come to an agreement, if it is agreeable to the other Members of the House, with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], representing the Gettysburg proposition, that we may debate this subject for two hours on each side, and that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered on Senate joint resolution No. 158.

Mr. BORLAND. I take it that the gentleman is asking unanimous consent to the statement he is making now?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BORLAND. If the previous question is ordered at the end of the agreed debate of two hours, will it be permissible to offer an amendment after ordering the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It will not, after ordering the previous question.

Mr. BORLAND. The agreement we have made extends to two hours' general debate on each side—four hours in all—but I have no power or disposition to preclude the right of any Member to offer amendments. I intend to offer an amendment of my own during the two hours' general debate, and I believe the agreement might well be that the amendments may be offered after the general debate or after the previous question, but voted on without further debate. I do not desire to extend the debate beyond the four hours.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] desires to offer an amendment. I can not consent to an agreement that everybody in the House should offer an amendment, because it might take a week to dispose of them. I am perfectly willing to consent to an agreement that two hours' general debate should be had on a side, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] shall have the right to offer an amendment, and that at the end of four hours the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and amendment to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it is only fair to say to the House that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] notified the Chair before the House met that he wants to offer an amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have an amendment that I desire to offer at the proper time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. And also that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LAFEAN] shall have the right to offer an amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. And that these amendments may be offered after my amendment is disposed of.

Mr. MANN. Will be offered at any time and be pending.

The SPEAKER. Is the proposition to cut everybody off from offering amendments except the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LAFEAN]?

Mr. EVANS. That is the proposition, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. JAMES. Well, Mr. Speaker, all these amendments that are offered to this resolution ought to be offered and pending before any one particular amendment is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. That will have to be done. They have not yet agreed upon that.

Mr. JAMES. I think the request of the gentleman from Missouri was——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will try to state what the sum total of these requests is: That the general debate on this proposition shall extend for four hours—that is, if enough gentlemen want to speak to occupy four hours—one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS], and at the end of the four hours the previous question shall be considered as ordered. In the meantime the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LAFEAN] shall have the privilege of offering amendments, and their amendments shall all be pending when the previous question is ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What time will be given to each one of us to present our amendments?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know about that. The Chair will recognize these three gentlemen to offer their amendments.

Mr. MANN. To offer their amendments.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BOOHER. I rise to ask, if this agreement goes through, does it cut out everybody else from offering an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It undoubtedly does.

Mr. BOOHER. Does it take unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. BOOHER. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] objects.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps a better solution of the matter would be that general debate go on for four hours, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] and two hours to be controlled by myself, and that at the end of that the previous question shall be considered as ordered, but that amendments may be offered before or after the previous question and voted on without debate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] will readily see that if that agreement is entered into there might be 50 amendments offered to this resolution on which the yeas and nays might be demanded.

Mr. BORLAND. Is not that the right of the House, anyway?

Mr. MANN. It is the right of the House to prevent any amendment being offered under the operation of the previous question, if the House chooses to.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be concluded in four hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], and——

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate be concluded in four hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. If no agreement is entered into, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] under the rules shall have an hour, and at any time during that hour, either in the beginning of it or at the end of it or between the beginning and end, he can move the previous question. If the previous question is voted, it shuts out everybody else from debate or amendment.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BORLAND. It is not desirable to do that. I do not think the House desires to do that.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] withdraw his demand for the regular order?

Mr. GARRETT. I withdraw it, Mr. Speaker, for the time being.

The SPEAKER. Is anyone preferring that request?

Mr. BORLAND. I am preferring a request, as tendered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], that general debate be concluded in four hours, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] and two hours to be controlled by myself; but I want the unanimous consent to extend no further than that.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I can not consent to that unless there is added to it a proposition that at the end of four hours the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, it might be possible that the original proposition, to which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] objected, might be agreed to if it included his right to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask that?

Mr. JAMES. I ask that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] asks unanimous consent that general debate upon this question shall run for four hours, if enough Members desire to speak to consume four hours, and that in the meantime, at any time the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LAFEAN], and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] shall have the right to offer amendments, which shall be pending, and that at the end of four hours the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not think it is a good precedent to set in this House, in the first place, to limit the number of amendments that may be actually offered. Again, I do not think it is a good precedent to set here to specify those who shall offer these amendments. How do the gentlemen in charge of the matter know who wishes to offer amendments until the matter is actually up? I think if we are going to specify those who are to offer amendments, the proper thing to do is for the gentleman who is in charge of the bill, Mr. EVANS, through the Speaker, to ascertain if any gentleman other than those specified wish to offer amendments, and if so, to give them an opportunity to do so.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. EDWARDS. I do not.

Mr. JAMES. Of course, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] will be too busy to go around and take a poll of the membership to find out who wants to offer an amendment.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky is too well versed in the affairs of this House not to know that that is not necessary. The Speaker could ascertain by asking if there are other gentlemen who wish to offer amendments.

Mr. JAMES. I am perfectly willing that the Speaker shall do that.

Mr. EDWARDS. I will be very glad to have that done.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that the difficulty with that would be that the amendment may not suggest itself to the Member until debate has developed it.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I also had that in mind.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, there are some others who are not in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] or of the other proposition, but who are in favor of one of these amendments. I want to know if there is any way whereby we can express an opinion in regard to the matter, not being in favor of either of the two propositions?

The SPEAKER. If this unanimous-consent agreement be made, then the only way the gentleman could express his opinion would be to get time either from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] or from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask if those gentlemen will give time to me in order that I may present the amendment that I propose to offer?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] propounds an inquiry to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], to know if either one of them, or both, will yield time to him or anybody else who desires to discuss these amendments?

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on the Library, I desire to say that we do not want to shut out any amendment to any proposition that is offered here in good faith, but we do not want any filibuster, and we want a vote on this proposition to-day.

The SPEAKER. That does not answer the question of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have already offered a resolution.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Texas that if this unanimous-consent agreement is entered into, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] would have only two hours and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] would have two hours at their disposal.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then they could yield such time as they see proper to me for the purpose of explaining the proposition that I desire to offer, and also to other gentlemen to explain theirs.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, there are a good many gentlemen who desire to deliver speeches here to-day.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BORLAND. If this unanimous-consent agreement is not adopted, I understand the procedure will be that the gentleman from Illinois, who has called up the resolution, would be entitled to one hour in his own right, during any time of which he may move the previous question. In order to secure further debate, it would be necessary to vote down that previous question, and then anybody else who arose would secure another hour.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. BORLAND. And then if an amendment were proposed, anybody would secure an hour for or against an amendment as long as the previous question be voted down.

The SPEAKER. That is a parliamentary situation.

Mr. BORLAND. Then, Mr. Speaker, I think we can expedite this matter by the committee allowing these gentleman freedom of amendment if we limit the general debate to four hours. My purpose was that debate be limited to four hours and that amendments be offered either before or after the previous question and voted on without further debate, and I believe that the committee will see that that will be the best solution of the question.

Mr. EVANS. That is provided, however, that the previous question be considered as ordered, and then we can vote on your amendment——

Mr. BORLAND. The agreement is that the amendments be offered before or after the previous question is voted on without debate.

Mr. EVANS. Provided there is a proper limitation on the number of amendments.

Mr. BORLAND. But the gentleman will see the objection to a limitation upon the number of amendments. Some gentleman might move the previous question, or the time for the previous question might arrive before some gentleman might have had an opportunity to gain the floor to offer his amendment.

Mr. EVANS. That will be your fault.

Mr. BORLAND. No; it will not be my fault at all any more than your fault.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I may want to offer an amendment here, and I do not want to be barred out. I do not want to claim for others what I would not claim for myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I wish the Chair would state again the proposition.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is that general debate on this question shall run for four hours, provided enough gentlemen want to speak to use four hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] and the other half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS]; at the end of the four hours' debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered, and in the meantime the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LAFEAN], and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] shall have the right to offer amendments, and they shall be considered as pending.

Mr. GRAY. What about an amendment from the gentleman from Indiana? Have I the right to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman from Indiana is not included in the pool.

Mr. GRAY. Well, I object.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I shall be forced to object, unless I have time to present my amendment.

Mr. GRAY. I object to anything I am not in.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Indiana be included in the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] asks that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY] be included in this privilege to offer an amendment.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to include the gentleman from Indiana in the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object unless I have time to present our amendment in 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] says he will object.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I should like to have at least 10 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems perfectly apparent the more the matter is discussed the further and further away from an agreement the House gets. There ought to be an end to it some time. I do not wish to interfere with the arrangement which the gentlemen have agreed upon, and it will be perfectly satisfactory to me if we could get it through, but it is evident we can not get it through, and therefore I demand the regular order.

Mr. JAMES. I think, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is the only one standing between the House and an agreement.

Mr. GARRETT. Very well, Mr. Speaker, I withhold the demand until we hear what can be agreed upon.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I think that the House generally would like to reach a final vote on this measure to-day. [Applause.] We are getting too near the end of the session. Important supply bills are pressing for attention, and I think that the proposition submitted by Mr. EVANS on one side and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] on the other, of a four hours' debate, is reasonable, considering the general demand for an opportunity to say something on this measure, but I do believe that the agreement ought to carry with it the condition that there should be a final vote within a reasonable time after that on the resolution and any amendments that may be offered.

The SPEAKER. There will be a final vote immediately; a vote on these amendments, and then a vote on the main question, but in the meantime the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] serves notice that he will object unless Mr. EVANS and Mr. BORLAND, or either of them, yields him 10 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT. I did not hear that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think out of four hours we are entitled to at least 10 minutes.

Mr. EVANS. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas half of that time, Mr. Speaker, if Mr. BORLAND will yield the other half.

Mr. BORLAND. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. EVANS. I said I would yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Missouri say?

Mr. BORLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Texas five minutes under that agreement.

Mr. BOOHER. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentlemen who are managing this thing apparently, that the debate be limited to five hours; that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] control two hours, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] control two, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] control one. That will let us take the vote at 6 o'clock. Those who are opposed to these two propositions ought to have more time than 10 minutes, and unless there is something of that kind I will object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

Mr. JAMES. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] only wanted 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What is the proposition?

The SPEAKER. The proposition as modified is this: That general debate shall run for four hours, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] and two hours by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS], each one of them agreeing to yield out of that time five minutes apiece to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], and that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LAFEAN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY] shall have the privilege of offering amendments, and that at the end of the four hours the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments to final passage. Is there objection?

Mr. BOOHER. I object.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 158) approving the plan, design, and location for a Lincoln Memorial.

Resolved, etc., That the plan, design, and location for a Lincoln Memorial, determined upon and recommended to Congress December 4, 1912, by the commission created by the act entitled "An act to provide a commission to secure plans and designs for a monument or memorial to the memory of Abraham Lincoln," approved February 9, 1911, be, and the same are hereby, approved.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL]. [Applause.]

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, the chief question pending before the House is whether Abraham Lincoln shall have a memorial in the city of Washington. There is no other city in the world, however large it may be, that has so many statues and monuments in its streets and public squares as has this city. There is the towering obelisk to Washington, unique in its impressiveness among all the memorials of the world. Then we have statues to generals, big and little, mounted upon horses of every breed, that give to some portions of the city the appearance of a cavalry parade. We have monuments to the foreign soldiers who aided us in establishing the independence of this country, and we have monuments and memorials to sailors of every period of our history. But the eye will search in vain for any memorial reared by the Nation in its Capital to the man who saved the Union, and in the saving of it gave up his life here, whose name was signed upon the title deed of freedom to 4,000,000 of slaves, and who reflected far greater fame upon the country by what he did in this city than any other of our statesmen. Congress has neglected its duty in this respect for a half century, and it is a reproach upon it. Lincoln does not need this monument. His place will be secure in the hearts of his countrymen for all time, and the homage of the struggling millions of mankind will go out forever to the man who illustrated the very chivalry of democracy. But the reproach will be upon us. I believe that the time has come at last when Congress can no longer fail to perform its duty to put up here in the city of Washington, the Capital of the country, a memorial to the greatest political genius our country ever produced. [Applause.]

I do not propose to be diverted into the discussion whether we should utilize the fame of Lincoln and attempt to discharge our duty to him by the construction of a national highway or by entering upon the policy of building boulevards in the different States. That is a question that should rest by itself. I think that Gettysburg was a great and dramatic battle, and that the boulevard, if one is ever to be built from here to Gettysburg, would be a very fitting thing. Before we do that we must look to the sources of our constitutional power. That question, I said, should be settled by itself. But if we are ever to have a memorial in the shape of a highway to commemorate the fame of Lincoln, then I think that highway should be built between Washington and Richmond.

Those are the two cities that but for him would have been the capitals of two independent nations. Between those cities was fought out the question whether we should have in this country one republic or two republics—whether we should have one flag or two flags. Lincoln fought for the idea of an indivisible nation, with its capital in the city of Washington. The Confederacy had its capital at Richmond. There was her president, there her cabinet, there her congress. There she kept her arms and her chariot.

That great contest was finally settled in favor of one country and one flag. If, then, we are to have a highway memorial to Abraham Lincoln, let it connect those two cities which but for him would have been the capitals of two hostile republics, and let that highway be built across the ground every inch of which was fought over by contending armies, over ground made fertile by the reddest and richest blood that was ever shed in war. [Applause.]

I take it that the House of Representatives has no disposition to-day to deny to Abraham Lincoln a memorial in the National Capital. Then the question comes, What sort of a memorial shall it be, and where shall it be placed? When I held the position now occupied by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] as chairman of the Committee on the Library, I endeavored to secure some sort of a memorial to Abraham Lincoln in the city of Washington. I endeavored to have the memorial in some way associated with the Capitol, but I found upon study that it would be so overshadowed by the Capitol that it would not be suitably placed.

The question of the site and the memorial was referred by Congress to a commission, and in the determination of the decision of that question we had the benefit of the best expert advice in the world. We had the National Commission of Fine Arts. Upon that commission was Burnham, the architect of the World's Fair buildings at Chicago, and at the time of his death without a peer, I believe, among the architects of the world. We had that true artist, Frank Millet, whose loss perceptibly augmented even the appalling horror of the Titanic disaster. We had the great landscape architect, Frederick Law Olmsted, and we also had the greatest of living sculptors, Daniel French. There never was a better corps of artists, representing not one branch of art alone but representing it in its broadest aspects, than that which we had to aid us in coming to the decision that we reached.

They reported in favor of taking the site upon the banks of the Potomac, on the line of the axis running from the dome of the Capitol through the Washington Monument, and nearly a mile from the Monument. Just opposite, upon the other side, rises the home of the great Confederate chieftain, Robert E. Lee. [Applause.] Then they recommended that we adopt the plan which gentlemen—Members of the House—have seen displayed in the House lobby yonder.

Two objections have been made to that plan. The first is that it does not represent the idea of efficiency; that it is a mere waste of money to expend so much for an unproductive work. The other objection is that it is unsuitable in character to the memory of Lincoln.

I am entirely willing to rest under the scorn of gentlemen who think that we should put everything in life upon the basis of efficiency. I know there are men who would think it a mere waste of time to carve an Apollo or a Venus, when the same amount of labor might rear a hovel to shelter some human head; or who would regard the work of a painter, spending many months of his life in putting immortal tints upon canvas, as a mere waste of time, when he might devote his energies to painting many buildings and preserving them against the weather. But I have myself no sympathy with this view. I not only do not regard it as waste to encourage those pursuits which aim to cultivate and satisfy our sense of beauty, but I believe they make an appeal which makes life richer and better for all of us.

The notion of mere efficiency would cover this world of ours with concrete structures, built with the most nicely calculated strains, and would fill them up with human automatons, each devoted to his own narrow specialty, perhaps of making a boot heel, and chased by fast flying machinery all through the day. We might produce more under such system, but the individual would be shrunk, it would make of us a race of dwarfs, and our ores and coal, I believe, might better be permitted to remain in the earth's untouched bosom. I would not have our country, when the final reckoning is to be made between her and other nations, have nothing to present but an abnormally developed efficiency, and have that put beside the painting, the sculpture, the literature, the music, the architecture, and those other consummate flowers of civilization which other nations would bring. I do not underestimate a highly developed industrial system, if only there should be the more developed also those higher and more artistic expressions of the aspirations of our race, which should be the choicest possession of every one of its children.

As to the fitness of this work, it is said that you are going to erect in memory of Abraham Lincoln a Greek temple. But what would you have? Would we have an Egyptian obelisk, would we have a Turkish mosque, or a Gothic or Romanesque chapel, or would we have an American skyscraper? We must have some type, and by common consent there has been no type better fitted for this purpose than that shown in the marvelous conception of the Greek. In whatever relates to artistic expression, whether in poetry, in eloquence, in sculpture, or in architecture, who is there in the world who can surpass the Greek? What more speaking marbles were ever carved than those of Phidias? What strains of poetry have ever broken with sweeter music on the human ear than those of Homer and of Pindar? Where else has eloquence reached the chiseled beauty of Demosthenes? And although but few remnants of the architecture of the Greeks have survived the hand of the barbarian and the tooth of time, yet when we come in view of some fragments of them to-day, broken though they may be, and 20 centuries after their time, we stand before them enthralled in wonder.

There is nothing more beautiful in architecture than the column of the Greek. Would we speak scornfully of this Capitol in which we now are as a Greek temple? What building in the world is more decorated with the Greek style of architecture than this? The Greek column speaks. It illustrates dignity, beauty, simplicity, and strength. However the soul of Abraham Lincoln might have been chiseled in its shaping, as he came finally to be every one of those elements was represented in his character.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this memorial, which has been designed by the greatest artists and architects whose advice we could procure. I am in favor of it because of its site upon the banks of the Potomac. It will be upon a spot over which the eyes of Lincoln used to look longingly and yearningly toward that part of the Union which he was trying to keep as a part of our common country. It will have across the river the home of the great Confederate chieftain, which now is the cemetery of thousands of heroes who wore both the blue and the gray. It will be a memorial in keeping with the majesty and the beauty of his character. In the fitness of its location, in the nobility of its character, and in the unique fame which it shall forever commemorate generations distant will be the day when it shall be paralleled by any other memorial reared to any one of the children of men. [Applause.]

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time, and ask that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] now proceed.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is evidently under the impression that I have some time. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman does not want to use any more time now, I will ask for time in my own right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize any gentleman who desires to speak.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for one hour.

Mr. BORLAND. Perhaps the gentleman from Illinois is unaware that an agreement has not been made.

Mr. EVANS. Oh, no; I am aware that there is no agreement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the balance of his time, which is 45 minutes, and the gentleman from Missouri is recognized for an hour.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a substitute which I offer for the pending resolution, which I ask to have read at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the plan, design, and location for a Lincoln memorial determined upon and recommended to Congress December 4, 1912, by the commission created by the act entitled "An act to provide a commission to secure plans and designs for a monument or memorial to the memory of Abraham Lincoln," approved February 9, 1911, be, and the same are hereby, disapproved and the commission is hereby continued, with directions to report to Congress at the session beginning the first Monday in December, 1913, upon a memorial highway from Washington to the national battle field of Gettysburg, or any other appropriate memorial road, bridge, institution, or structure.

Mr. MANN. Is this an amendment offered by the gentleman, or a substitute?

Mr. BORLAND. A substitute.

The SPEAKER. It seems to be an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the plan, design, and location for a Lincoln memorial, determined upon and recommended to Congress December 4, 1912, by the commission created by the act entitled "An act to provide a commission to secure plans and designs for a monument or memorial to the memory of Abraham Lincoln," approved February 9, 1911, be, and the same are hereby, disapproved, and the commission is hereby continued, with directions to report to Congress at the session begining the first Monday in December, 1913, upon a memorial highway from Washington to the national battle field of Gettysburg, or any other appropriate memorial road, bridge, institution, or structure.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order; or, I am perfectly willing to reserve it for a time, if the gentleman desires to address the House.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. The point of order is, first, that this is a joint resolution which the gentleman proposes to change to a concurrent resolution; second, that the amendment is not germane to the resolution pending before the House.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, the substitute was drawn at the time that the concurrent resolution was on the calendar. Then they discovered their blunder and changed it to a joint resolution, and the joint resolution has been called up. I ask that this be changed to the proper form of a joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to withdraw it, remodel it, and offer it again.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask that it be changed by substituting the words "Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled," and that it be entitled a joint resolution.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will move to strike out all after the resolving clause, he will have no difficulty about that proposition.

Mr. BORLAND. I offer it as a substitute for all after the resolving clause.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the modification.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to read the body of the substitute again.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the resolution pending before the House; or I will reserve the point of order if the gentleman does not desire it disposed of at this time.

The SPEAKER. Which of the alternatives does the gentleman from Missouri prefer?

Mr. BORLAND. I will ask the gentleman to reserve his point of order. I do not think there is anything in it, but let it be reserved.

Mr. MANN. I think the point of order is perfectly good, but I am willing to reserve it and let the gentleman discuss his proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is recognized for an hour.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD]. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have here another Lincoln memorial project, handed me this morning by Col. McElroy, editor of the National Tribune, which has been approved by many citizens and citizen soldiers of Washington. This scheme has a utility feature. It provides for a Lincoln temple at the corner of Seventh Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, where the Government owns the ground, and for a great convention hall, where the people from the whole country coming here in religious, commercial, and other conventions, can have a free and convenient meeting place. As stated by Col. McElroy, it would be to Washington what the Forum was to Rome and the Acropolis to Athens. It would be a Greek temple with a meaning—a temple of patriotism. But in my limited time I can not discuss this project. I am for the Lincoln highway—72 miles—from Washington to Gettysburg.

Only once did I ever meet Abraham Lincoln. That was on the 4th of March, 1865, when I was clothed in the grim harness of war, with my once blue uniform tarnished with grime from the red-clay roads of northern Georgia. In November, 1864, I voted as an Ohio soldier for Abraham Lincoln for President while on the march in western Tennessee—voted in an old camp kettle, and we counted the votes at night by the light of the bivouac fires. I want to vote for a permanent and fitting and generous testimonial to Abraham Lincoln now, but not for a $2,000,000 Greek temple, to commemorate the greatest American of his epoch, who never even learned the Greek alphabet. [Applause.]

We have hundreds of monuments dedicated to Abraham Lincoln now. We have four in this National Capital. Under the great central dome stands, in white marble, Vinnie Ream's famous statue of Abraham Lincoln in the plain clothes of an American citizen. Only a few feet to the left is another statue—head and bust—also in marble, double heroic size. In Judiciary Square, on a raised pedestal, is a full-length statue of Lincoln, also in marble. In Lincoln Park stands the historic bronze statue of Lincoln unshackling the slave. So far as I know, none of the patriotic people of the United States are demanding more multiplication of Lincoln statues in this city. The city is now full of statues and monuments that are silent and cold and stand for nothing but Grecian art and sculpture and remind us only of nations and civilizations that are dead.

I will vote for a monument or statue, with ideas in it—a statue to fittingly typify Abraham Lincoln's mission and career. But there is nothing in this Greek temple, however artistic, however ornate, however impressive, that even suggests to the critical observer either the character, or career, or mission of Abraham Lincoln. Lincoln was never a student of Greek art or Greek sculpture. A Greek temple would be an appropriate testimonial to a learned linguist of a national university who had worn out his life in teaching the literature of a dead language, or of a Pagan civilization long since dead, but never for a great citizen of this Republic, who never saw the inside of a university in his school days and who learned to read books at night by the light of a pine-knot fire. Born in a cabin, he breathed the untainted air of the woods and fields. Born poor, but rich in soul and brain and hope and courage. Can we satisfy the patriotic longings of the American people to fittingly commemorate the memory of Lincoln by erecting a $2,000,000 Grecian temple in the National Capital? I do not believe it. We concede that no more is to be said of Abraham Lincoln than has already been written. History has said its last word. We all know that he was, of all public men of his time, the simplest in manners, the most all-pervading in human sympathy, the most constant in his devotion to his ideals. North or South, he has no critics to-day. I met him only once. But I stood within 10 feet of Abraham Lincoln on the 4th of March, 1865, and heard him deliver his last inaugural—his last oration on earth. I heard him say:

Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive to finish the work we are in, to bind up the Nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have bourne the battle, and for his widow and his orphan.

[Applause.]

We have made 48 years of history since that eventful day, but I can see Lincoln now as I saw him then, a tall, gaunt, stalwart man, with deep lines of care furrowing his cheeks, with inexpressible sadness in his face, a face that told the story of a man of many sorrows. A sad face, a strong face, a face radiant with the inspiration of a great soul, as he voiced in prophecy the ultimate destiny of this Nation. As a soldier of the Republic I heard Abraham Lincoln voice his national ideals in his last oration to the American people, and to-day as a citizen of a restored Republic I intend to vote for my conscientious conception of those ideals. It is time we had some American art and American sculpture and American ideas in this National Capital. The brave and prescient patriots of the Revolutionary epoch who founded this Capital and started the young Republic on its career never intended to make this city the home of wealth and monumental splendor, like Athens or Rome. It was intentionally located in the wilderness, that the representatives of the people should be free from the venal influences, the demoralizing environment of a dominating social set of money-fat idlers. [Applause.] This is the only great Capital around the world originally planned in native forest. All the great capitals of the Old World had long commercial lives before being crowned as capitals. It was only 48 days after the last act of ratification of the Federal Constitution that the first-born Congress of the original thirteen States decreed the wilderness on the eastern shore of the Potomac as the future Capital of the Republic.

Only a short time ago I was much amused over the observations of a newly married pair from Fort Wayne, Ind., who came here to shed their honeymoon. They were gazing in awe and admiration at the semicolossal group of statuary on the east front of the Capitol by Persico, erected in 1846, representing the discovery of America. Columbus is personated holding at arm's length a small globe on the top of which is cut "America." Beneath his ponderous legs crouches an awe-stricken Indian girl without a particle of drapery to shield her shapeliness from the gaze of mankind. It took five years to make the group and cost us $24,000. The ridiculous phase of this historic group was very pertinently illustrated by the observations of our young couple from Fort Wayne. I was not surprised when the young lady remarked, "I reckon that is Pocahontas and Capt. John Smith." "No; Flo," remarked the young man, "that is not a captain's uniform and Pocahontas never appeared in that shape without something on. This chap has on tight pants you see and baseball sandals, and what's that he's got in his hands? That is probably a baseball. I tell you what I think this is, Flo, you know Washington has got a baseball team called the Senators, and I'll bet yer this represents the pitcher, as the champion of America, bossing the Goddess of Liberty, and that stone woman on the Dome is the Goddess." [Laughter.]

The young lady smiled sweetly on the young man, in evident pride that he was so well up in the classics, and they walked over to view the other group just opposite. This group is intended to represent the sentiment of America. It is by Greenough and was executed in 1842 and cost $24,000. There are five figures—a hunter rescuing a naked white woman, with a naked baby, from a naked savage, while by the side of the woman is the faithful dog, appearing as if he did not know what all the racket is about. "What do you say that is, Charlie?" said our sweet nineteen. Charlie gazed intently at the naked Indian, the nude woman, the undraped baby, and the indifferent dog, and then slowly said, "Flo, I just give that up." Flo and Charlie are no exceptions to the great run of tourists. Thousands of visitors and curiosity hunters gaze daily upon these ridiculous groups of allegorical statuary, and no one appears to comprehend their significance.

A NAKED GEORGE WASHINGTON.

One of the most hideous pieces of art that mortal man ever beheld is the colossal statue of George Washington, by Greenough, ordered by Congress in 1832 for the Rotunda of the Capitol. It was made in Florence, Italy; was eight years in construction; is 12 feet high; weighs 12 tons; and cost $44,000. In 1840 the U. S. frigate Constitution was dispatched to Florence, Italy, to bring this monstrous monstrosity to the United States.

It was landed here in 1841, found to be too large for the Rotunda, and it stood in front of the Capitol for over half a century. It is now hidden from all human eyes, and I trust forever.

This immense figure represents George Washington naked to the waist, sitting in a chair. The right hand is raised high above the head and points to heaven; the left hand holds a Roman short sword, with the handle presented. A mantle falls over the legs. There is a small figure of Columbus on the left side and of an Indian on the other. There is a Latin motto carved on the back of the chair and on the front of the pedestal in raised letters. We might excuse a sculptor who would set up for public admiration the nude figure of a gladiator or a prize fighter, but was it not a hideous thing to put up a naked George Washington in front of our National Capitol? Without going further into the observations of rural tourists, is it not an outrage on American art to have a statue of George Washington naked, sitting in the chair of a Roman emperor, holding the sword of a Roman soldier, encompassed about with Roman symbols, and disfigured with a Latin motto? And yet this statue is a classic, patterned to commemorate Pagan art and sculpture, the same as the proposed Greek temple.

Go down Capitol Hill and look at the unsightly monstrosity—that marble memorial to Gen. Grant. We have just wasted a quarter of a million on that statue. Take a view of the pedestal in the center, surrounded by four African lions, crouchant with desperate claws. At one end of this misfit in marble is a group in bronze, intended to represent four plunging, crouching, rearing artillery horses, pulling a 6-pounder cannon over an impossible road of stumps and mud, with the two leading horses, with forelegs high in air, over a precipice. A cruel, painful conception, and entirely inappropriate, as Gen. Grant never commanded a battery in war and never shotted a cannon. And the African lions—not even a product of America. Not an idea in it to remind us of Gen. Grant; not a suggestion of the remarkable career, both in war and peace, of the foremost man of all the world.

Look at the equestrial statue of Gen. Jackson in front of the White House. See the hero of New Orleans on an impossible war horse, a classic from Rome, if you please, patterned after the show riders of the Roman ampitheater, with their horses on their hind legs in the sawdust. Not thus sat Gen. Jackson in war's reeling fray, when the foam hung from the lips of his tired horse and his wet limbs were slashed with the bloody slime of the battle field.

Look at the great figure above the central dome of this Capitol, that probably 90,000,000 of people think is the Goddess of Liberty. This is also an Italian product—a Roman classic, if you please. It was designed by Crawford in Rome in 1858. It is the figure of a woman, the sword and shield of a soldier, and the Phrygian helmet of a Pagan. This helmet is pierced by a crest of eagle quills. The only thing American about this statue is the eagle quills. Hence we have no Goddess of Liberty on the dome to personate a country all free and forever to be free. Let us chisel off the barbarous Pagan helmet and place a liberty cap instead, with a tiara of 48 stars, and bespangle it with jeweled gems from our mountains and mines—something American, something to symbolize a great Republic. [Applause.]

Take the Washington Monument, conceived and planned and originally built to the height of 152 feet by the contributions of patriotic citizens and societies. And how does that immense pile of white marble compare with Mount Vernon as a national shrine. Not at all. There is no sentiment, no patriotic inspiration in the cold conceits of sculptured marble. The hundreds of thousands of visitors and excursionists to this National Capitol take a far-away look at this cold marble pile and then go to Mount Vernon. And in the environment of the home of George Washington, in the association of George Washington with his historic mansion, and in the presence of his tomb Mount Vernon and not the Washington Monument has become our national shrine. And it will so remain long after the Washington Monument has crumbled into dust.

The most heroic incident in the life of Abraham Lincoln was his oration on the battle field of Gettysburg. It is conceded to be the leading classic in the heroic literature of the war period. The most valued and heroic incident in the life of Abraham Lincoln was his oration on this great battle field. Here was fought the most desperate, the most signal, and the most decisive battle of the entire four years' war. Next July the last sad remnants of two great armies—the blue and the gray—will meet in reunion on the battle field of Gettysburg—a continent-wide patriotic reunion to proclaim to all the world that this Nation is now one and inseparable. Let the Congress of the United States embrace this occasion to make that battle field a sacred national shrine. Let us build from this now overly ornated Capitol a national highway, to be known for all time as the Lincoln Highway to Gettysburg. And on the spot where Lincoln stood when he delivered his memorial oration on that ever memorable November day let us erect a marble tablet, with every shining sentence of that immortal classic cut into the solid marble. [Applause.] Let us have a memorial to Abraham Lincoln with ideas in it—ideas of patriotic inspiration. Monuments have no sympathy, no emotion, no voice. Let us have tokens and symbols that are prescient with inspiration for the future of our country. The great present, with its growing zeal for humanity, with a culture deepened and broadened by science and enriched by all history, with its strong winged soul of prophecy, hot with the blood beats of a realized brotherhood claims us, calls us, and holds us. Let us not stagger back into pagan darkness to study art and sculpture from nations and civilizations long since dead that knew neither chastity nor charity nor Christ. Give us something with life in it—American ideas vibrant with the full-throated voice of patriotic inspiration. Let us make a national shrine of Gettysburg and build a broad highway to this Capitol and hallow it for all time with the revered name of Lincoln. [Continued applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, the fame of Abraham Lincoln is a growing one. Forty-seven years after his death his fame is greater to-day among his compatriots than ever before. Monuments have been built to Abraham Lincoln beginning almost with the time of his unhappy decease, and as years go by these monuments have been discarded by the American people as utterly inappropriate and insufficient to express the profound national appreciation of the wondrous character of Abraham Lincoln.

It was not that he was a ruthless conqueror, it was not that he was a pagan philosopher, it was not that he was a Lorenzo di Medici, patron of the fine arts, but that he was a great, profound student of human nature, with a sympathetic heart that beat in unison with the humblest citizen of his native land.

And as that impression has gone forth throughout all the rank and file of American citizenship, the monument to Lincoln's fame has gained an enduring foundation which will raise it to the eternal skies.

With all due respect to this Lincoln Commission, no one is prepared to admit that they have spoken the final word for the preservation of Lincoln's fame. It would not have been possible before the present time to secure an appropriation of $2,000,000 to commemorate any American except Washington. These other monuments have cost trifling sums in comparison, but they are discarded as utterly inadequate for the purpose. Washington contains Lincoln monuments, one at the courthouse and one on Lincoln Square. There is no dearth of Lincoln monuments, big and little, but they have not commanded the love and veneration of the American people as being expressive of the American ideal of Lincoln.

I am opposed to this Greek temple on one hand and I am in favor of the highway on the other. My views are simply stated: First, I believe the Greek temple is wholly inappropriate and will be so deemed by the American people. Second, I believe that the highway is nearer to a perpetual monument of Lincoln, nearer to expressing the epoch of American history, than any other form of memorial capable in or about the National Capital.

When this committee was chosen for the task of spending $2,000,000 of the people's money for a memorial in the city of Washington, they were confronted at once with the difficulty of spending that large sum without producing something that would detract from the National Capitol and the Washington Monument. It was a matter of some difficulty to spend such a sum and get any adequate return upon the money without erecting something that would produce an unfavorable comparison with the Washington Monument. Finally the committee hit on the Greek temple plan, or the Greek temple plan was conceived in the minds of the Fine Arts Commission, and the committee were induced to sanction it.

Mr. Speaker, the Greek temple form of construction is a very familiar one to architects, as I understand. It has been adapted to all kinds of public buildings, treasuries, churches, libraries, and art galleries. It has been duplicated countless times in the city of Washington and in every other great capital in the world. It will be duplicated countless times. It is the most hackneyed form of architectural art known now to architects. Architecture or art is, or should be, some expression of the age and clime which gives it birth. The Greek temple consists of a large rectangular building with a heavy, flat roof supported by columns. It is the product of a land of perpetual sunshine, where light and air are free and where the only desirable quality of the building is shade. We have transplanted that form to our land of gray skies, to a land of wintry storms, to a land of artificial light and artificial heat, and we have adapted it successfully to many public buildings.

If the designs of this art commission are carried out, we shall have a great mall reaching from here to the Washington Monument, lined on both sides with buildings of Greek temple construction—one for the Department of Commerce and Labor, one for the Department of Justice, one for the Department of the Interior, one for the Department of Agriculture. There will be perhaps six or eight great white marble Greek temples stretching down from here to the Washington Monument. Then on the other side of the Monument will be another Greek temple if this resolution be adopted, only that Greek temple will be empty. It will contain only a heroic statue of Lincoln clad in American clothes, and it will be called a memorial to Abraham Lincoln. The Fine Arts Commission have so committed themselves to the Greek temple form of construction for Washington that they will turn every building in the Capital into a Greek temple in the course of time if their plans are carried out. Nobody would be able to tell whether that Lincoln memorial was an addition to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing or whether it was a storage place for congressional seeds until he got inside of it. The Bureau of Engraving and Printing, just now approaching completion, is a modification of the Greek temple with its heavy columns. The architectural absurdity of trying to adapt that plan to every conceivable building could not be better illustrated than in what happened at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, for in a building of that kind the most desirable thing is light, and the thing that the Greek temple excludes is light. They have actually gone to the length of moving the glass windows out to fill up the intervening spaces between the columns in order to secure the necessary light for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. I am informed, my colleagues, that your Fine Arts Commission actually drew plans for a school building in the District of Columbia in the form of the Greek temple, and when it was found it would require artificial light in the daytime for the children to study they discarded the scheme and burned up the plans. So the Greek temple, beautiful as it may be, is not adapted to every possible purpose, and certainly it is not adapted to a commemoration of a great American commoner. A week ago this day, when this matter was supposed to come up, one of the greatest artists in the country, Guston Borglum, was in the city of Washington. He is the man who molded that wonderful rugged head of Lincoln that stands in the rotunda of this Capitol, the most remarkable head of Lincoln that has ever been produced. I take it he is an artist whose artistic criticism is of some value. Borglum said that the Greek temple project does not contain $10,000 worth of art in the whole $2,000,000 worth of appropriation. He says that is a stonemason's job. The hackneyed temple design is simply enlarged to use up the requisite amount appropriated. If Congress had appropriated $4,000,000, it could have made it twice as big. Yet that interview was taken by every reporter to the papers in Washington and went into the waste-paper basket. Borglum says the epoch of Lincoln is filled with all the marvelous tragedies of the human heart.

It shows a great people emerging from the most tremendous struggle in history to solve the great problem of self-government, and the great problem of justice and equality to the weak, and that, being vital with everything that speaks of American life and American history, has been embalmed and ossified into a Greek temple borrowed from a distant age, and a pagan age at that.

I am opposed to the Greek temple as wholly inappropriate under any aspect to express the American sentiment for Lincoln. My colleagues, this Greek temple proposition is not primarily a memorial to Lincoln at all. It is a part of a much larger scheme, called, I believe, the "McMillan plan" for the beautification, as they call it, of Washington by turning it into a vast mausoleum. If Congress had appropriated $2,000,000 for a memorial to Alexander Hamilton or Thomas Jefferson, or, perhaps, as the gentleman from Illinois suggested, Jefferson Davis, the Fine Arts Commission would have dished up the same identical Greek temple. It is not any more appropriate for Lincoln, in fact less appropriate for Lincoln, than any American that could possibly be named. It need not be assumed that these $2,000,000 of the people's money which would be expended for this useless purpose will be the end of the matter. That building will have to be heated, lighted, plumbed, furnished with caretakers, attendants, guards, watchmen, and fuel; $18,000 or $20,000 a year in the sundry civil bill will not take care of that building. It is not to be assumed that this is the end of the expense of a useless building. It is designed to commit Congress to a scheme for the purchase of property in the District and for the enlargement of the park area of the District, and for the acquisition of more or less unsalable property in the District, of which the end can not be foreseen.

Why, there is a companion bill to this, that I mentioned yesterday, which has come over from the Senate, to appropriate $2,300,000 to move the Botanical Gardens into Rock Creek Park. That is one step contemplated under the present arrangement. How much more we have no way of telling.

On the other hand, I am in favor of the roadway, not simply because it has been indorsed by the Grand Army and by organized labor, and by other American bodies, but because I believe that there is no point within reach of the National Capital which is so identified with the epoch of Lincoln and with his character and career as the great battle field of Gettysburg. When foreigners come to our shores they do not come to see how well we can imitate the temples of ancient Greece; they do not come to see how well we can copy the Sistine Madonna or the Last Supper. They come to see something vital of American life, American ideals, and American history. When Americans travel about their own country they are not to be shown copies of the art of some distant age and clime, but something that will remind them of the struggle and career and triumph of Americans, and American history and American ideals.

The most extraordinary figures have been given out in the report of the Library Committee. I can not now stop to analyze them. It is said that this road would cost $35,000,000. That is the mildest statement in this report. In my State, where we have good roads, we build them for $4,500 a mile—that is, with a 12-foot surface, with an oil binder.

If you would make this road cost $20,000 a mile, the entire cost would be less than $1,500,000. There would be given unlimited contributions by States, by regiments, by patriotic societies, that would make this memorial to Lincoln not only a memorial to eternity but a memorial which would constantly be more and more of a memorial, and not be discarded at some future date as utterly inadequate to express the national sentiment toward Lincoln. It could be made one of the show places of America, if not of the entire world.

This memorial, this beautiful boulevard, would reach from the Nation's Capital to the Nation's greatest battlefield, to the culmination of that mighty struggle which solved for all time the question of the unity of the American Nation. Not a foreigner who came to our shores but would make a pilgrimage over that mighty boulevard from the Capital to the battle field or from the battle field to the Capital. Not an American citizen, not even an American schoolboy, but would feel that the longing wish of his heart was to see the great battle field of Gettysburg and then the great Capital of the Nation under whose flag he lives.

That great battle field would be an object of pleasure and interest besides being an opening of America to Americans. We send every year thousands of Americans and millions of American dollars to Europe, and yet we have more in this country to show them of natural beauty and heroic and historic triumph than they have in any country elsewhere on the civilized globe.

That boulevard would reach from the Capital to that great battle field which was immortalized not only by the burning words of Lincoln but by the dauntless heroism of the citizen soldiers of America, who on that great field for three long days, under a burning July sun, hurled themselves against each other in the greatest war of modern times, and proved to themselves and to all the world that they were one in race, one in courage, and one in destiny. [Applause.] Upon that great historic field during this current year will meet the veterans of the North and the veterans of the South, to clasp hands forever across the bloody chasm and to mark the realization and the fulfillment of the dearest wish of Abraham Lincoln—a peaceful, prosperous, reunited American Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I thank you. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized for the purpose of offering an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] offers his amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

"That the plan, design, and location for a Lincoln Memorial determined upon and recommended to Congress December 4, 1912, by the commission created by the act entitled 'An act to provide a commission to secure plans and designs for a monument or memorial to the memory of Abraham Lincoln,' approved February 9, 1911, be, and the same are hereby, disapproved, and the said commission is hereby continued, with directions to select a location in the city of Washington, D. C., and to secure plans and designs for the erection of a Lincoln national memorial hall and to make recommendation and report thereon to Congress at the session beginning the first Monday in December, 1913; said hall to be erected and dedicated to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, and to be suitable for use as an auditorium for all such national and international public assemblies and uses as Congress may hereafter designate."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order upon the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserves a point of order upon the amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I shall address myself to the necessity for the amendment that I have offered to the pending resolution. The commission alluded to in the amendment was created by act of Congress approved February 9, 1911. The members of that commission are WILLIAM H. TAFT, SHELBY M. CULLOM, JOSEPH G. CANNON, GEORGE P. WETMORE, SAMUEL W. MCCALL, Hernando De Soto Money, who has since died, and I do not remember at the present time the name of the gentleman who has taken his place, and CHAMP CLARK.

Under the terms of the act they were created a commission to be known as the Lincoln Memorial Commission. Their duties were to prescribe and determine upon the location, plan, and design of the memorial in the city of Washington, D. C., to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, subject to the approval of Congress; and if my amendment is adopted by this House it will continue this body in office for the purpose of determining where and how this Lincoln memorial building should be erected.

This commission, under the act creating it approved February 9, 1911, has the further authority to employ the services of such architects, sculptors, and others as it shall determine to be necessary, and to avail itself of the advice and services of the Commission on Fine Arts created by the act of March 3, 1910. And the act further provides that the construction of the monument or memorial shall be upon such site as shall be determined by the commission and approved by Congress, and its construction shall be entered upon as speedily as practicable after the plan and design therefor is determined upon and approved by Congress.

This amendment provides that the site shall be selected by this commission, that they shall secure plans and designs for the erection of a Lincoln national memorial hall, and make recommendations and report thereon at the session beginning the first Monday in December, 1913, said hall to be erected and dedicated to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, and to be suitable for use as an auditorium for all such national and international public assemblies and uses as Congress may hereafter designate.

Under my amendment, if adopted, this commission will be fully authorized and continued in power for the purpose of locating a Lincoln national memorial hall in this city for such public uses as Congress may hereafter designate.

I believe that if this amendment is adopted and this commission is given the authority provided in the amendment and the act creating it that they can and will report back to Congress the first Monday in December of this year, a plan for a hall to be erected and used for public purposes in this city that will be an honor to Abraham Lincoln, and also that will be of vast benefit to the people of this city as well as to the people of the whole United States. In my judgment enough has been said—and I will not reiterate any of the arguments—against the plan that has been adopted by this commission for a Grecian temple. Suffice it to say that it is in a location in Washington that I dare say but very few persons have visited or will ever visit. It is, I think, at least 2,000 feet from the Washington Monument and something like a mile from this place, and located on very low ground on the banks of the Potomac River, where only a great driveway is now located. It could not be used for any useful purpose. It is not in a position where it would be ornamental, because it is too far away from the Capitol. As between the two, I would vastly prefer to see the public-memorial road built from here to the battle field of Gettysburg. But that opens up a very dangerous proposition in my judgment.

Mr. RODENBERG. Could this hall that the gentleman has in mind be utilized for the purpose of an inaugural ball?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This Grecian temple can not be used for the purpose of any assemblage whatever. It would only be a thing of beauty and of no practical utility, while the hall I propose would and could be used for inauguration or any other public purpose authorized by Congress.

Mr. RODENBERG. I mean the hall that the gentleman has in mind. Could that be used for inaugural balls?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It could be used for all public purposes that Congress might be asked to designate. It could be used in the same way that the English people are using the Albert Memorial Hall in London.

But with reference to the public-road proposition, it is evident to my mind, from a document that I hold in my hand, published recently by Congress—Report No. 1294, Sixty-second Congress, third session—that there is more behind this memorial-road proposition than appears on the surface. In this report it is stated that—

> Two general plans for this memorial will be presented for the consideration of Congress. One plan restricts the memorial to a purely ornamental structure in Washington.

I have said enough on that proposition, because I do not believe this House will adopt any plan providing for a building of no practical utility. The report says, further, that—

> The other plan contemplates the construction of a great highway or boulevard, leading from a superb memorial structure in Washington to the spot at Gettysburg where Lincoln delivered his immortal address, which "crystallized the spirit of the Republic into a paragraph." Through its extensions by the various States this will rapidly develop into a transcontinental highway—

Here the object of this resolution is fully exposed, because it points out that—

> This will rapidly develop into a transcontinental highway and become the nucleus of a great national system of public roads which will bind together all sections of the Nation. Every city, town, and hamlet in the country will build a highway to connect with some extension of the Lincoln Road.

Now, let us inquire who is behind this great national highway proposition, to extend to every hamlet, town, and city in this country public roads built from money voted from the United States Treasury.

This document, gotten up and backed by the automobile manufacturers of the United States, further says that—

> We are therefore conducting a national campaign of publicity and organization to get the wishes of the people before Congress. As a part of this campaign it is very desirable to send a personal letter with a leaflet and form like the inclosed to 1,000 leading citizens in each of 275 congressional districts, asking those addressed to take this matter up with their Congressmen and Senators. To put these letters with inclosures in the mail costs about $45 per 1,000, or a total of $12,375.

This literature comes from the Lincoln Memorial Road Association, and it is the source of the sentiment that is backing this great Lincoln memorial road from Washington to Gettysburg. The secretary of this Lincoln Memorial Road Association is Lester T. McCleary, and he is taking advantage of this bill in order to advocate and push forward the great automobile proposition they are trying to advance in this country. Here is what the document further says:

> Having in mind the far-reaching importance of this matter, one of the good-roads committee connected with the automobile industry has subscribed $2,500 to aid our publicity campaign. Many of the leading automobile clubs and individual manufacturers have subscribed varying amounts. You may have subscribed directly or indirectly, but even if that is the case it is vital to the success of this movement that you subscribe a substantial amount in addition, as more money is urgently needed, and a popular subscription could not be raised in time to be available.
> Over 100 Members of the National House of Representatives, including the Speaker of the House, and many of the leading Senators of both parties have already expressed themselves in favor of the memorial road. We would like to make it as nearly unanimous as possible.
>
> I hope you will give this movement your strong moral and financial support and that you will act at once.
> In addition to making a substantial subscription now, I hope that each of your executive officers will write a personal letter to his Congressman and his two United States Senators urging them to favor the plan for the Lincoln memorial which includes the road to Gettysburg, and that you will arrange to have each of your representatives and agents throughout the country do the same.

Now, it is clear that the Automobile Good Roads Association is behind this memorial road for the purpose here fully disclosed, of extending the great national highway to every hamlet and village in this country. I do not believe there has ever been a more dangerous set of bills introduced in Congress than the bills providing for spending untold millions of dollars for building public roads in the States out of the Public Treasury.

If we should adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] it would be an entering wedge for the appropriation of hundreds of millions for public roads, and I hope that it will not be agreed to.

The advisability and practicability of building a great national memorial hall in this city is not doubted, and no one can truthfully say that it is not needed. A Greek temple is not needed. A great automobile road is not needed. It would not be built for the use of the common people of this country but for the use of automobile owners. Abraham Lincoln was an extremely practical man, and prided himself on being one of the great mass of the common people of this Nation, and we do him no honor by erecting the Grecian memorial structure proposed by this resolution.

It is necessary for us to adopt something that the whole people of the United States will be benefited by. But a few days ago we had the question before us as to where we would have the inaugural ceremonies. If this hall had been erected it could be used for that purpose. We have river and harbor congresses and other like great public assemblies that are called to meet in this city. All of these organizations and meetings are semipublic, and if this Lincoln national memorial hall is erected it would be an easy matter for Congress to direct that all such assemblies could use it for their meetings.

Mr. SHARP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will.

Mr. SHARP. Is the gentleman aware of the measure introduced by Senator ROOT, providing for a memorial to George Washington, which contemplates the erection of a building substantially like the one now advocated by the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I was not aware of that; but I think the Washington Monument standing in this city could not be improved upon. I have heard from no quarter any demand for the erection of another monument to Washington.

Mr. SHARP. It has already passed the Senate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. So has this Lincoln memorial resolution passed the Senate. I think there is a public sentiment behind the Lincoln memorial resolution, but I know of none for the erection of another monument to Washington. I know of no better or any more lasting memorial which could be erected to the memory of Lincoln—or any more beneficial one—than to have a great hall, such as the Albert Memorial Hall in London, dedicated to his memory. Mr. Thornbury, a writer on old and new London, describes in his book the Prince Albert Memorial Hall.

Mr. CANTRILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CANTRILL. I would like to ask the gentleman if, in his judgment, it would not be a better public policy to appropriate money for the construction of buildings in Washington to alleviate the suffering of thousands of Government employees who are now employed under certain conditions that are absolutely inhuman? Would it not be better to do that than to expend this vast sum of money simply to beautify the city?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman is correct, and he takes the same position that I have always taken.

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, I would like to make one further remark. This is the only time that I will have to call attention to certain facts. I will state that there are hundreds of employees—and I can name the places—housed in this city to-day, who are working under conditions that are absolutely inhuman. I can point the gentleman to a department where Government employees have been working at a temperature of 112 degrees and where they are selected for that employment on account of the stature of the men, because no man of moderate height can go in there and work under the roof under which they have to work.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I presume the gentleman is referring to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing?

Mr. CANTRILL. No. There are other places also. There was another department where, on the sixth floor, there were 165 men and women employed. The fifth floor, directly underneath them, was covered with inflammable material—oil, blankets, and other things. The fire escapes to the sixth floor were locked, and at the drop of a match those people would have been cremated in an instant. There are dozens of cases of that kind here in Washington, and I want to ask the gentleman if it would not be better public policy, if it would not be better for the American Congress, to give its time to the alleviation of human suffering on the part of hundreds of Government employees and remedy these inhuman conditions rather than to squander millions of the people's money in the erection of a memorial to anybody at this time?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that bills are now pending for the erection of buildings to take the place of those to which the gentleman refers, and I hope that in a very short time those buildings will be erected and that the conditions of the people who work in those buildings will be improved and that the clerks will have comfortable rooms in which to perform their duties.

Mr. CANTRILL. The point I wanted to bring out is whether we would not better take care of them now, remedy those conditions first, and then, if the Government finances permit, later on take up and consider these matters that are in the nature of a luxury, so to speak.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the Committee on Public Buildings has now under consideration plans to erect buildings as fast as it can be done to take care of every Government employee in the city. I will state, further, to the gentleman that several years ago, when we authorized the building of the House Office Building, that I tried to defeat the measure, but we did not have enough Members on the floor opposed to the building to call the roll upon the question and force a record vote. I took the position then, and I take it now, that every public building where clerks are employed in this city should be erected before we erect a public building for ourselves, and I believed then and I believe now—although the office buildings were needed—that we commenced at the wrong end of these building enterprises, and that we should first have housed comfortably every clerk in the employ of this Government before constructing a marble palace for ourselves.

Mr. CANTRILL. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Texas whether he does not know it to be a fact that there are now working in the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, in one large room, from 400 to 500 men and women under conditions which are worse than those that prevail in any sweat shop in the country—absolutely barbarous, a disgrace and a shame to the Federal Government? Is not that the fact?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the conditions are bad, and the gentleman must understand that we are now constructing one of the largest and best buildings in the city for the purpose of taking care of those people in the Bureau of Printing and Engraving.

Mr. Speaker, referring again briefly to the Albert Memorial Hall, I desire to state that after the Prince Consort died the question was raised in Great Britain as to what kind of a memorial should be erected to him. Queen Victoria survived him for many years. It was her desire and the wish of the English Nation that some proper memorial should be erected to the memory of Prince Albert. They agreed upon the Albert Memorial Hall as the best kind of memorial. It is a building on the edge of Hyde Park and is known as the Royal Albert Hall of Art and Sciences, and owes its origin to the fund which was raised in 1862 for the purpose of erecting in Hyde Park the national memorial to the late Prince Consort, which we have already described. With every desire that this recognition of the debt which English art, science, and industry owed to the Prince should be, in every sense of the word, such a memorial as the country itself preferred, the Queen requested a committee of gentlemen to suggest the form which the testimonial should assume.

And that testimonial took the form of a great building, such as suggested in my amendment. The author of the book I hold in my hand further says:

> After deliberating upon the matter, the committee recommended the erection of a personal memorial to the Prince Consort in Hyde Park, opposite what is best known as the Central Hall of Arts and Sciences. * * *
> A pardonable degree of curiosity was aroused respecting the ultimate destiny of the hall; but this was set aside when it was announced that the new building was intended, amongst other things, to accommodate science congresses, to provide a suitable arena for musical performances, and to serve other equally useful artistic and scientific purposes.

Such as the hall I propose can be used, and possibly will be used, under the direction of Congress.

> For this the building is admirably adapted from the immense disposable space it offers. Between 6,000 and 7,000 people can be seated in the hall, and, besides this, when the necessity arises, it is possible to place as many as 2,000 spectators in comfortable positions on an incline staging in the picture gallery, which runs nearly around the hall.

And he goes on to say, further:

> Guided by the principles upon which the Romans constructed those amphitheatric buildings, the remains of which strike modern spectators with awe and admiration, the designers of the Albert Hall have succeeded in raising a structure of eminently beautiful and attractive proportions. Seen from the park or the Kensington Road, the hall stands boldly out in all the magnificence which invests a building in the style of Italian Renaissance.

The Kensington Road enters the park at the point where this building is erected. It goes on to say:

> In the plan of the interior it can be seen at once that the architect has taken for his model the old Roman amphitheater, though with such important modifications as, happily, quite another kind of entertainment, and, unhappily, less genial skies required. Roman plebeians and aristocrats were mere spectators, looking down on the fierce and bloody spectacles provided for their amusement in the arena. Here it was necessary so to provide that people might both hear and see, but above all things hear. Such a condition gives the key to the arrangement of the interior. Imagine, then, within an outer shell of staircases, corridors, refreshment and retiring rooms, a vast hall in shape of a graceful oval, of which the southern end is all but filled by the organ and orchestra, rising upward in tiers of seats. Fronting this orchestra is the auditorium, of horseshoe form, composed of arena, a level space; the amphitheater, or, as it might be better termed, the stalls, sloping upward toward the boxes; three tiers of boxes; above them the balcony; and, lastly, above it what is called the picture gallery. This gallery is not within the proper limits of the ellipse forming the interior, but is built over the staircases and corridors, which form an outer zone to the portions of the auditorium below. It runs, therefore, around the whole of the interior, and the 30 Italian arches, with their scagliola pillars, through which the body of the hall is seen, are really its great ornaments.

The boxes and balcony project from the wall into the ellipse, each tier extending 3 feet beyond that above it. Such an arrangement enables the occupants of each tier to see without much difficulty, and be seen by those above them. One of the most remarkable features of the hall, in fact, is the perfect view of the interior, and of all within it, which can be had from any point. * * *

Since the day of the opening of the hall by Her Majesty, when the orchestra was occupied by 1,200 instrumentalists and vocalists, concerts on a grand and extensive scale have been the chief use to which the building has been put; and it was also used for part of the display in the annual industrial exhibitions of 1871 to 1874. The grandest scenes, perhaps, which have taken place within its walls were on the occasions of the State concerts given in honor of the visits to England of the Shah of Persia, the Czar of Russia, etc.; more recently the most notable functions have been the reception of Mr. Stanley and the concert on the occasion of the German Emperor's visit to England.

If we adopt my amendment, a similar building would constitute a splendid memorial of Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. When was the hall completed?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. In 1867, I believe; it was started in 1862, if I remember rightly.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me? In 1875, the first and only time I crossed the water, I visited London and was over there three weeks and saw the memorial to the late Prince Consort just off Hyde Park, not a hall, as beautiful a memorial as I ever saw. I did not know that hall was ever built until this minute.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that that stands directly in front of the memorial, and that it contains the great auditorium which I have been describing. I have a picture of it here.

Mr. CANNON. I am just telling the gentleman of my experience, and I was about an average mast-fed fellow, who crossed over there to see things. I saw that splendid monument, with no utility about it, and I never knew that the hall existed.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I regret that the gentleman overlooked that magnificent hall. He certainly was not with a Cook party and being conducted through the city of London to see its famous buildings, as I was a few years ago. It is the most wonderful hall in that city, and said to be the most wonderful in the world.

I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CURLEY] five minutes, and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Speaker, I listened, as did every Member of this House, with intense earnestness and with great admiration for the ability displayed by the distinguished and learned son of Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] in portraying the necessity that the memorial should take the form of a Greek temple. And we listened with the same rapt interest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] as he told the story of the temple erected in London, wherein he pointed out the fact that there is no hall available for a meeting place in Washington.

Mr. Speaker, I had an opportunity to attend a meeting held in a convention hall, that was capable of holding 5,000 zealous, enthusiastic Clark supporters for President, that is located in Washington and which is of sufficient size to accommodate most any character of gathering.

Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that we have rather strayed away from the significance that should attach to a memorial to Abraham Lincoln. The one salient feature that stands most preeminently forth in a study of the characteristics and of the life and of the struggles of that great somber, sorrowful man, who belongs to the centuries, whose deeds, achievements, and greatness overshadow those of any man of any nationality that ever trod God's footstool, was his love of humanity.

It permeates every act of the life of Lincoln, and we best remember this grand old citizen of America, whose first vision of life was a little log cabin in a Kentucky forest, a cabin that had no blinds and that typified simplicity itself, but where was born in surroundings equally as humble as those of the Nazarene the Nation's first citizen.

And this great, soulful character best portrays his affection for all the people in the closing words of his Gettysburg address:

> A government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

And if a memorial is to be erected or constructed to commemorate the great life, the great character, the great achievements of a sublime individual, like the great American, Lincoln, let it be something that will typify his service, because service, after all, was the most predominant trait in the life of Lincoln, and that service was dedicated to humanity.

Admitting that a Greek temple, as is here proposed and which unquestionably will be adopted, is agreed upon, I ask in what way does it typify the splendid sacrifice for humanity and freedom of this sublime character, whose heart bled during the great internecine struggle for all the people?

The Appian Way, leading from the Forum through the centuries, has not only commemorated but proved of service to the people of Rome.

Lincoln needs no monument. His service for humanity has enshrined him in the hearts of the American people and in the hearts of liberty lovers in every portion of the civilized world. His keeping the Nation whole, his striking off the shackles from a race of people, and this sublime and splendid Republic, united and free, standing forth a beacon of hope to the oppressed and downtrodden seeking the light and justice, is the best testimonial that could ever be constructed by human or divine hands in the hearts and memories of a grateful people. [Applause.]

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, I will say in advance I do not expect to consume an hour of time. All are desirous of reaching a vote this afternoon, and many Members have expressed a desire for time.

While here and there among the membership of the House there are those who differ as to the details of the proposed memorial, although concurring in the finding that it should be erected in Washington, it is manifest that the best organized and most aggressive opposition to the plan proposed comes from those who for one cause or another are in favor of the highway to Gettysburg. I do not question the high-minded and patriotic impulses of the Members of this House who favor that proposition. It is well, however, for the people of the country to know something of the influences that have been the most active in the campaign that has been carried on to promote the highway project. I therefore desire to insert in the RECORD at this time an extract from a letter written by the executive secretary of the Lincoln Memorial Road Association of America. I am free to confess that when the road to Gettysburg was first suggested I was favorably impressed. I am a believer in good roads, and perhaps my feelings on the general subject of good roads influenced to some extent a friendly feeling for the Gettysburg highway. This predisposition was soon changed when the question was taken up for serious consideration.

The letter, after calling attention to the importance, from a good-roads point of view, of the Federal Government taking an initial step, proceeds as follows:

> We are therefore conducting a national campaign of publicity and organization to get the wishes of the people before Congress. As a part of this campaign it is very desirable to send a personal letter with a leaflet and form like the inclosed to 1,000 leading citizens in each of 275 congressional districts, asking those addressed to take this matter up with their Congressmen and Senators. To put these letters with inclosures in the mail costs about $45 per 1,000, or a total of $12,375. Having in mind the far-reaching importance of this matter, one of the good-roads committee connected with the automobile industry has subscribed $2,500 to aid our publicity campaign. Many of the leading automobile clubs and individual manufacturers have subscribed varying amounts. You may have subscribed directly or indirectly, but even if that is the case it is vital to the success of this movement that you subscribe a substantial amount in addition, as more money is urgently needed and a popular subscription could not be raised in time to be available.

This extract speaks for itself and discloses that the campaign, for such it can very properly be called, that has been conducted by this so-called Lincoln Memorial Road Association is in the interest of good roads and the automobile industry. It also throws some light on the source from which the funds emanated to defray the expense. The letter concludes as follows:

> In addition to making a substantial subscription now, I hope that each of your executive officers will write a personal letter to his Congressman and his two United States Senators, urging them to favor the plan for the Lincoln memorial which includes the road to Gettysburg and that you will arrange to have each of your representatives and agents throughout the country do the same.

That they have done so is evidenced not only by other documentary proof of record but by the numerous letters and telegrams that have been pouring in to Members of Congress from automobile concerns, urging them to appropriately memorialize Lincoln by building a highway to Gettysburg. [Applause.]

Yesterday while my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] was addressing the House he inserted in the RECORD and criticized a letter written by the Fairmount Park Art Association, of Philadelphia, to the Members of Congress from Pennsylvania, expressing views in opposition to the Gettysburg highway as a memorial to Lincoln. A little later in his remarks the gentleman inserted in the RECORD what seemed to me a rather remarkable letter, which I desire at this time to read:

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AND BUSINESS MEN'S CLUB,
San Antonio, Tex., January 24, 1913.

Hon. WILLIAM P. BORLAND, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have yours of the 16th inclosing Library Committee's report on the Greek temple proposition, for which accept thanks.

I appreciate your sending me this report very much, and I immediately got busy and distributed these reports among our influential—

Citizens who are interested in securing the best and most appropriate memorial to Lincoln? Oh, no—among our influential good-roads enthusiasts—

Think of it! What a bald confession! Not even an attempt to mask the real designs.

The letter proceeds—and in a few hours gathered them up and redistributed them—

The gentleman is certainly not lacking in activity or zeal for good roads—and in addition to that I had one of our daily papers print the report and also print a statement from myself and others who had picked this report all to pieces and explained to the people the ridiculous part of it.

This is certainly rich—

Almost every organization of any kind whatsoever in San Antonio has wired Representative SLAYDEN insisting that he support the Washington to Gettysburg highway, and these telegrams have been constantly going to Mr. SLAYDEN for over two weeks, and more especially since it was referred back to his committee. The Washington Post clipping you sent me was published in one of our daily papers the day I received your clipping.

Evidently even gentlemen here have been interested in seeing that the press of the country are kept in touch with their proposition through the various good-roads enthusiasts.

Yesterday there was a telegram sent to Hon. JOHN N. GARNER, which reads as follows:

"We appreciate your efforts in behalf of the Lincoln memorial highway and pledge our assistance at any time we can be of help to this cause.

"J. W. WARREN,
"President Texas Good Roads Association.
"CHAS. GRAEBNER,
"President Chamber of Commerce.
"A. M. FISCHER,
"President Bexar County Highway League.
"CHAS. O. AUSTIN,
"President Real Estate Exchange.
"ATLEE B. AYRES,
"President Fiesta Division of C. C."

In addition to this quite a number of Mr. GARNER'S admirers are writing him personal letters. In addition, our highway division, the real estate exchange, Chamber of Commerce, Fiesta Association, and the San Antonio Automobile Club have asked me to express their gratitude to you for the noble work that you are doing for this highway.

Not for a Lincoln memorial, but for "this highway."

We all assure you that we appreciate it, and I hope that I will have the pleasure of meeting you on March 6 and 7 at the good-roads convention, which will be held in Washington.

Yours, very truly, D. E. COLP, Secretary.

Whether intentionally or unintentionally there is manifest from this letter a very distinct back fire on the distinguished chairman of the committee, Mr. SLAYDEN, who for 14 years has been an honored Member of this House, and who, as chairman of this committee, has been conscientiously seeking to discharge his duty.

I submit that it is evident from the letter of the Lincoln Memorial Road Association, as well as from the letter I have just read and many other things with which the Members of this House are familiar, that this movement for the highway to Gettysburg has been promoted largely by good-roads enthusiasts, the automobile industry, and other business concerns.

When we witness the zeal with which they are seeking to use the sacred name of Lincoln to enhance their profits, it almost recalls the ghoulish humor from the grave scene in Hamlet.

Imperial Caesar dead and turned to clay
Might stop a hole to keep the winds away.

This House will never permit the sainted memory of Lincoln to be commercialized for pecuniary profit. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield to me for a minute?

Mr. PICKETT. With pleasure.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman also read the letter from the Fairmont Park Art Association?

Mr. PICKETT. I will not read it in my time. It is printed in the RECORD as a part of the gentleman's remarks of yesterday, and I referred to it.

Mr. BORLAND. I trust the gentleman in fairness will read the literature in reference to the Greek temple side of the controversy.

Mr. PICKETT. You had an opportunity to read it.

Mr. BORLAND. I did read it yesterday.

Mr. PICKETT. And I am now replying.

I will add, however, that there is nothing in the letter issued by the Fairmont Park Association which does not go to the merits of the proposition, and certainly there is nothing which reflects any personal interest that the members of the association have in any line of business that will be promoted by any action taken by Congress in this matter.

Mr. Speaker, the memorial proposed in the pending resolution comes before the House not as the product of hasty action by the committee to which it was referred. It has been considered for years and embodies the best thought and contributions of the highest authorities on such subjects. It comes before this House with the deliberate and ripened judgment of the distinguished citizens who compose the Lincoln Memorial Commission, representing all parties and all sections, and which held 16 meetings during the consideration of the subject; with the approval of the gentlemen who compose the Fine Arts Commission, selected for their high repute in the world of art; with the approval of the Senate, whose unanimity of action reflects its cordial indorsement of the memorial; and, lastly, with the unanimous recommendation of your own committee, which has given to the subject its best thought and endeavor.

I do not know how many of the Members of the House have read the document which I hold in my hand, containing the report of the Lincoln Memorial Commission; extracts from the report of the Fine Arts Commission, and also extracts from the architect's description. It is difficult to conceive how anyone could read them without being carried irresistibly to a conclusion favorable to the memorial proposed. For the purpose of having it appear in the RECORD, I may be pardoned for quoting briefly two paragraphs therefrom, one a quotation from the late Hon. John Hay:

As I understand it, the place of honor is on the main axis of the plan. Lincoln, of all Americans next to Washington, deserves this place of honor. He was of the immortals. You must not approach too close to the immortals. His monument should stand alone, remote from the common habitations of man, apart from the business and turmoil of the city—isolated, distinguished, and serene. Of all the sites, this one, near the Potomac, is most suited to the purpose.

The other from the description of the architect who designed the memorial:

On the great axis, planned over a century ago, we have at one end the Capitol, which is the monument of the Government, and to the west, over a mile distant from the Capitol, is the monument to Washington, one of the founders of the Government. If the Lincoln memorial is built on this same axis still farther to the west, by the shore of the Potomac, we will there have the monument of the man who saved the Government, thus completing an unparalleled composition which can not fail to impart to each of its monuments a value in addition to that which each standing alone would possess.

There is a touch of the immortal in the isolation with which the architect enshrouds the names of Washington and Lincoln. The conception is lofty, one that grows upon you the more you study it. Washington was the commanding figure in the epoch which secured our independence and established our institutions. Lincoln was the potential figure in the epoch which tested the unity of our Republic and made our liberty real.

Washington and Lincoln will forever stand companionless in American history. They rise in their isolation as our two greatest citizens. [Applause.]

The word "immortal" is used with such abandon that its true significance is all too often lost. Time may be a cruel, but is a seldom erring, critic. To be immortal means more than to have achieved distinction in an epoch or a place among the great of an age or a cycle. It rests upon achievements which survive the receding years and live forever in the hearts of men. [Applause.]

Reflect for a moment upon the concept of the memorial. At one end of the main axis is the Capitol of the Nation, in the center the Monument to Washington, and at the other end the memorial to Lincoln. Looking into the future we can see the extension across the Potomac to Arlington, and then we will have at one end the Capitol, at the other Arlington, and in between the Monument to Washington and the memorial to Lincoln. The citizen, as he journeys thither, will first visit his Capitol with all that it symbolizes. He will then turn his eyes down the long vista to behold the Monument to Washington, the Father of his Country; beyond, the memorial to Lincoln, the savior of our Union; and yonder, in the distance on the green hillside of Virginia, once a part of Dixie but now and forever, thank God, a part of our common country, his eyes will stop at Arlington, where sleep the Nation's heroic dead. The Capitol, Washington, Lincoln, Arlington. What a sublime equation! What an immortal association! What a companionship for the ages! [Applause.]

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], in his remarks this afternoon, suggested that the highway to Gettysburg "could be made one of the show places of the world." Think of it! The name of Lincoln utilized to make one of the "show places of the world." I do not know whether the gentleman from Missouri intended the meaning which the language imports, but this I know, it would be the result if the highway plan is adopted.

I do not care to discuss whether the highway could or could not be built within the appropriation. That question is of minor importance in the light of the graver consideration, How could it be protected by the Government from being used for purposes which would destroy any element of a Lincoln memorial? The Federal Government would have no jurisdiction over lands adjacent or contiguous to the highway, and they would be used, by the same spirit of commercialism which we have already seen manifest, for show places, amusement parks, and the like. The papers would be filled with advertisements of vaudeville performances and all the modern novelties of entertainment designed to attract the curious or pleasure-seeking crowd. In automobile phraseology it would be known as the "great joy ride of the country." I am unwilling that Lincoln's name should be thus desecrated. This is a good time and a fitting occasion for the Congress of the United States to give a practical lesson in American patriotism. [Applause.]

Contrast, if you please, the difference in the effect upon the mind and heart of the future citizen between an automobile trip over a highway to Gettysburg and a visit to the memorial proposed in the pending resolution. After visiting the Capitol of his country, with all its hallowed traditions and all that it brings to his heart, and then a visit to Washington's Monument, he pursues his way to Lincoln's memorial, rising with its lines of strength and beauty before him. In the center hall, 60 feet wide, 70 feet long, and 60 feet high—higher than this Chamber—he pauses in silent communion before a beautiful bronze statue of Lincoln. He then turns to read in bronze Lincoln's matchless speech at Gettysburg, and then in another place Lincoln's second inaugural, the closing paragraph of which is burnished in every American heart. That one sentence, "With malice toward none, with charity for all," has no counterpart in literature save the one which fell from the lips of the Great Master, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, it is with such an inspiration I would leave the pilgrim patriot at the shrine of Lincoln. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] is recognized.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I desire time only to read a letter written me, by the adjutant of the largest Grand Army of the Republic post in the district I have the honor to represent, upon the subject under consideration, and which was approved by a unanimous vote of the membership of that post. The letter reads as follows:

SWITZ FURNITURE CO. (INC.),
Kearney, Nebr.

In answer to a circular letter just received concerning the Lincoln memorial, will say that I am unalterably opposed to a pile of foreign marble for a memorial to Lincoln. In my opinion a pile of marble does not represent anything, especially of foreign importation. Build the living memorial, the Gettysburg road. This will become a living memorial because there will be constant additions and improvements to the Lincoln road.

The nations of the world will come to this country to look at an American monument or memorial. It will at once become an attraction to everybody and permit everybody to aid in beautifying the road, subject of course to the approval of a commission, who will have this in charge. The American people would add millions of dollars in beautifying this road. In that sense it would be in reality a living memorial. It would become a national road to commemorate a nation's hero, in which all would have an interest and pride. Nothing could be more fitting for a memorial to Lincoln than this road from the National Capitol to the place where the greatest battle of the war was fought, and where Lincoln delivered his immortal address after the battle.

This would be such a departure from the pile of marble, at the same time so appropriate, that I should think that everybody would see it in that light. If this plan could be put before the people, in my opinion it would receive the approval of the Nation.

Respectfully, yours, F. J. SWITZ.

P. S.—After reading the above letter to the Smith Gavit Post, No. 299, it was moved and carried that the post indorse the letter of Comrade Switz. Carried unanimously.

F. J. SWITZ, Adjutant.

[Applause.]

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the resolution by inserting after the resolving clause the following:

"That recognizing in Abraham Lincoln the greatest advocate of equal opportunity for all the people, and in whose illustrious life and achievements are exemplified the highest possibilities of the American youth, the establishment of a national vocational school, in which shall be given, at the lowest tuition possible, practical instruction in the trades and agriculture, is the most appropriate memorial that can be erected to perpetuate his memory; and that the Lincoln Memorial Commission, created by the act approved February 9, 1911, is hereby authorized and directed to use all or any portion of the amount appropriated by the provisions of said act in formulating and executing all plans necessary to give effect to this resolution, subject to the approval of Congress.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the line of demarcation between the two sides of the House is not identical with the line of difference upon this important measure, and I wish to say at the outset of my remarks, with the intention of being fair to those who champion one side or the other of the question, that it is not my purpose to consume the hour or any considerable portion of it in my remarks. I do not desire to be dilatory in any way, and I would be very glad to have this measure finally passed upon before we adjourn to-day. Whatever is left of my time I shall be pleased to surrender back to the House.

It so happens, Mr. Speaker, by a coincidence that I had not before noticed until I looked at its date, that it is exactly one year ago to-day that I introduced the resolution which has just been read from the Clerk's desk. I have listened with a good deal of interest to the arguments presented by the champions of these two respective plans, which seem to be quite as far apart as the east from the west. I have been not a little amused to see the application of an old saw exemplified in the indulgence of the talk here, one side against the other—the pot calling the kettle black. It seems to me it all argues for the carrying through of a wholly different and better plan. I would not call my resolution a compromise measure. It has the features of neither of these measures that are advocated so eloquently to-day. Though it is widely different from either of them I have been not a little encouraged in the belief during the past week or two since the decision upon this measure became so imminent, and from reading editorials of leading papers throughout the country, that there is a very strong sentiment which, if it could only be molded and crystallized and directed along concrete lines, would defeat both of these propositions.

When I asked for some time in which to discuss the proposition, I frankly told the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] who had kindly consented to accommodate me, that I was against his proposition, which involved the construction of a $2,000,000 highway. It would furnish no utilitarian purpose whatever, except to the automobilists, who have been characterized here as much too enthusiastic by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT]. But if I am against the expenditure of this great sum of $2,000,000 for a highway—and I am willing to go a long way in subscribing to some of the views expressed and pictures so eloquently painted by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT] as to what might become of some of the unpleasant features of that highway—I am equally against any expenditure of the people's money for this great mass of granite and marble, such as we have depicted in the illustrations of the monument in our lobby outside of this Chamber. Mr. Speaker, if this question could be submitted to the vote of the American people, I very seriously doubt whether either one of these projects would receive a majority. Certainly, if the question were submitted to the rank and file of Americans—that class of our citizens which outnumbers the other class as nine to one throughout the United States, that class from which Abraham Lincoln, the emancipator of a great race, himself sprung—I believe an overwhelming majority would be against either one of these expensive and unwarranted propositions.

I want to say, lest my position be misunderstood, that no expenditure of money, no matter how large, could properly attest the attributes and the services of the greatest, in many ways, of all the Presidents of the United States. I am an admirer of Abraham Lincoln, and I am glad that the Nation's affection for his memory has taken form in such a magnificent appropriation. But, as has been well said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] and other speakers, it hardly comports with his character and achievements, with the high ideals set before the American people by Abraham Lincoln, that we should erect to his memory a monument such as they do abroad for Kings. Lincoln was of an entirely different class, differing from them as the American free people differ from the subjects of those monarchs. Perhaps the first speaker, Mr. MCCALL, is correct in his view that we should not necessarily embody the utilitarian in the memorial which we should erect to Abraham Lincoln's memory. It may be the consummation of all that is sublime and poetic, as the gentleman pointed out, to portray a character in our history upon canvas or sculptured in marble so it almost speaks; but it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if there is any one thing that ought to be placed above the mere pleasure and enjoyment of a highway on one side or the embodiment of sentiment and art on the other it is the elevation of mankind.

We have heard a great deal during the past few years about conservation projects. We are undertaking to conserve our streams, our water powers, and our forests; but, to my mind, we have not yet directed our conservation policy and our conservation energies, if I may use that expression, in the most effective channels. Why, a conservation, my colleagues, the highest in degree of all, would be a conservation not alone of human energy, but of human character [applause], the building up of the great mass of people of our country by a proper recognition of their needs. That brings me to the consideration of my own resolution. My resolution has directly in point the building of a great vocational educational institution. I want to say to those who favor the establishment and the location of this memorial in the city of Washington, that if my resolution should be adopted and the plan therein contemplated carried out, it would not be necessary that this great institution should be located outside of Washington. If, indeed, the work to be done within its walls was to educate teachers in vocational work, then it would be a most appropriate location, because we have located here within a radius of a mile and a half all the great institutions and departments of the National Government.

I was reading some months ago the statistics showing the proportion of school children or children of school age attending, or who ought to be attending, our schools but failed, for some reason or other, to attend after the age of 14; and I am fortified by the official statistics when I say that 8 out of 10, not your children, of course, or mine, but the children of the great mass of the poor people—that class from whom Abraham Lincoln came himself—never again enter a school after that age. Eight out of ten of all the school children beyond a secondary grade have not, it literally means, the advantage of a school of any kind, though the doors ostensibly are open to them free of charge. Think of it, 8 out of 10! Why, my colleagues, if we have any more problems to solve in this Nation that will require time, that can not be solved within a day, I do not want you to forget that the hope of a proper solution of those problems rests in the boys and girls of to-day. In the history of a nation the development of a generation is but as a day; but if you expect great reforms they must all come from these little ones, because in the to-morrow they will take your seats here. If they are to govern wisely and well, they must have every benefit possible from our educational system.

Merely to open a school and say it is free of tuition to our children is not solving the problem. Theoretically it is giving one the same right as the other, but sooner or later we must come, gentlemen of this House, to adopt a system of training and education such as Germany and other foreign nations have entered upon successfully in the past 20 or 30 years. In my home town we have quite a number of factories which manufacture a superior quality of goods in certain lines, and if we seek to-day to get those who are specially skilled in those industries, where do we go? Why, we go to Germany or we go to France, where they specialize in that particular kind of work. So the resolution which I have introduced in the House to-day and for which I speak calls for a national indorsement, if you please, of a system that is as yet hardly practiced to any extent whatever in our own country.

I say it not in words of censure of our institutions. We are a new country. We have so many, many opportunities here for the advancement of young men just starting out in life; we have so many broad acres that are yet unpeopled by the millions to follow that we do not, of course, find ourselves driven by necessity, as do those crowded countries in Europe. But the problems are coming, and it is for us in all due and proper time to seize and take advantage of the kind of training such as we have seen so successfully carried out in Germany and the other countries referred to.

Every day you gentlemen have upon your desks before you petitions in favor of the Page educational bill, or the Lever bill, or some other similar measure favoring Government cooperation with the States. So this is not in any sense of the word an innovation. I say to you, my colleagues, if we could use the $2,000,000 that we have for that purpose in the founding or the building of a great vocational school in the city of Washington, we would lay the foundation for a memorial which would even outlast the granite foundation and marble superstructure of the beautiful monument so eloquently advocated by other speakers.

I am not one of those who would criticize that monument. Architecturally considered—while I am in no position to speak with authority—I have not studied it very much; but it seems like a beautiful building. I do not know whether it would be better to go back for our models to the Egyptian times or find them in Grecian architecture, or in the more simple lines of the so-called colonial period. I will not undertake to pass upon that plan of the memorial.

My objection lies in the fact that the American Congress is about to appropriate the great sum of $2,000,000 for that kind of a memorial, when if we wanted to memorialize Abraham Lincoln and recognize his services to humanity in that manner a very much less sum would answer the purpose just as well. I do not think that you could improve upon the statue of Abraham Lincoln designed by St. Gaudens and erected in Lincoln Park, Chicago, and I am told that that cost about 3 per cent of what this would amount to; in other words, about $60,000. Surely, for the ages to come, it seems to me that Cecil Rhodes, that great empire builder, who ran the modern highways of steel from the Southern Ocean northward across Africa into the land of the ancient Ptolemies, will be best known by the endowment of his Oxford scholarships when all his earthly achievements shall have been forgotten. You are all familiar, from reading at least, with his last resting place. In the cleft of a great granite rock, facing the south, in Cape Colony, I believe, among the scenes of his exploits as a miner and railroad builder, repose forever the remains of that great man.

But far away to the north, the country of his birth, in England, the conception of his lofty purpose will go on and on and on just as long as human institutions shall last. That is the character of a memorial I would like to see founded here, my colleagues. There have been a number of letters read on both sides, some in favor of the highway and some in favor of the Lincoln monument, but, if I may ask the indulgence of the House just for a few moments, I want to read from a communication of a former Member of this House, twice governor of the State of Massachusetts, a man who by foresight and industry has not only built up a great fortune for himself, but has also been a great help to the laborers and artisans of Massachusetts.

I wish to read now a few remarks from Gov. Foss, who wrote me upon the merits of this particular resolution. I shall not take the time of the House to read more than this one letter, but I want to say that without solicitation came all of those other letters from educational institutions throughout the country, from business firms, and from large manufacturing establishments. So far as my resolution is concerned, I have requested no petition to be sent to Congress. I have asked no petitions to be sent to any Member in favor of it, so that if it is not known to the extent that other propositions are known it is because there has been no effort made except to get for my own personal satisfaction the opinions of eminent educators and men who are at the heads of great industries in this country.

I read Gov. Foss's letter:

BOSTON, MASS., March 13, 1912.

Hon. W. G. SHARP,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SHARP: Many thanks for the copy of your speech on the subject of establishing a vocational school as a memorial to Abraham Lincoln.

I hope your project will commend itself to the favorable consideration of Congress. If you succeed in securing some permanent Federal supervision for vocational guidance and for elementary training along industrial lines, you will have rendered a great service to this country.

I doubt whether there is any other public project which, in relation to its cost, offers a better assurance of public benefit, provided the plan is worked out along practical lines.

In Massachusetts we are particularly interested in educational work of a practical, industrial, and technical character. The legislature has recently voted $1,000,000 to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in tacit recognition of its value to the State in training young men and women toward self-support.

That school is not a State institution, but the public is convinced of its importance to the State.

I believe that industrial education not only increases the average self-supporting power of the community, but that it has also a still more marked efficacy, for the reason that any normal man or woman cheerfully occupied in remunerative work has very little incentive to enter a life of crime.

Massachusetts now has in operation several public institutions known as industrial schools, to which are sent young boys and girls who have shown some minor disregard of law but who are not really criminals. In my judgment, it is a very wise use of public money, whether under State or Federal supervision, to start young people upon careers of usefulness.

Elementary work along vocational lines appears to be the best method of doing this. I believe that our industrial schools in this State enable us to get at the problems of evil doing and idleness before the police and the judiciary are compelled to deal harshly with them.

I take the liberty of sending you, as of possible interest, the full text of a speech which I read last year before the American Society of Anthropology and Criminology, together with some recent reports of our several industrial schools. I also send you copies of my two inaugural messages of 1911 and 1912, in which you will find my recommendations to the Legislature of Massachusetts in respect to still further efforts to forestall crime and at the same time build up the industrial efficiency of the Commonwealth.

It seems at first thought preposterous, but it is really true that in this country we are spending less money on education than we are on military preparations and expenses. I believe that we are not spending as much money on education as it is costing us to meet the direct and indirect losses from crime and pauperism. Inasmuch as education of a practical character is surely the best means of reducing these two last-named evils, I think you are working on the right track and I wish you success with all my heart.

Very truly, yours,

EUGENE N. FOSS.

That is a very interesting letter, indeed, and I have many others from prominent agricultural institutions, from men prominent as the heads of great industries, and from men who value the special services of those who have had this kind of training. Not to take the time longer of the House, and thanking many of you who have been so patient as to listen to the advocacy of a proposition that is almost entirely new and not strongly favored on account of prior commitments to these other projects, I wish to say that in my opinion we could not do a better thing than to turn down both of these projects and establish a utilitarian institution which shall be for the uplift of mankind, that shall emphasize and embody in its character, for all time to come, the life and services of that greatest of all humanitarians—Abraham Lincoln. [Applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman from Illinois would use some of his time.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, the very purpose of the amendment to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] having, as he declares, as its chief end the perpetuation of the memory of Abraham Lincoln, the secondary, if not an equal paramount purpose of perpetuating good roads, will, in my judgment, be an injury rather than an aid to establishing the policy of governmental aid to good roads. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the Congress of the United States, on February 9, 1911, with a unanimity that bespeaks a reunited country, enacted into law a bill providing for the erection of a monument or memorial in the city of Washington, D. C., to the memory of Abraham Lincoln. It provided that the construction of the "monument or memorial herein and hereby authorized shall be upon such site as shall be determined by the commission herein created and approved by Congress." This commission thus created has made its report. That is the question now to be considered by this House. There was no thought or suggestion when this original question was considered of attempting to use the memory and fame of Abraham Lincoln as a subterfuge to further the cause of Government aid to good roads. I am a friend to good roads. I voted to appropriate many millions of dollars to be divided between the States for this laudable purpose. The question now under consideration is, Shall the House repudiate its former action; shall the reputation and glory of Abraham Lincoln be used as a makeshift to begin by indirection that which gentlemen fear they shall be unable to do directly in the open? [Applause.]

Lincoln was born in Kentucky. He went to the State of Illinois. Kentucky gave him to Illinois and Illinois gave him to the Republic and the Republic gave him to the world. If a road were to be built—if in earnest you desire to perpetuate his memory and to pay tribute to his character—I submit that the road ought not to go to that sea of carnage and flood of sorrow, the battle field of Gettysburg, but it ought to be built, if a road is what you want, from Springfield, Ill., where he lived and lies buried, back to the old Kentucky home where he first saw the light. [Applause.]

But we Kentuckians love the memory of Abraham Lincoln too well to desire to use that as a vehicle for the purpose of throwing upon the Government the maintenance of and assistance in building public highways. [Applause.] Why, the arguments made here this morning, Mr. Speaker, that Washington's Monument was cold and clumsy looking, that some of the statues here to Lincoln are not beautiful; the argument that when men want to pay tribute to one whom they love and who made for the good of their Republic they should do something that would be useful—that argument would tear down every temple; it would uproot every shrine; it would even pull the flag from the sky because it might be made more useful than by simply swishing there. [Applause.]

The Washington Monument, Mr. Speaker, is a great tribute to the father of our country. I remember that when I first came to this Capital City when but a boy the great patriotic lesson that was impressed upon my mind by the lofty monument to the memory of the father of the Republic, which was at once emblematic of the affection and pride of a grateful people. [Applause.] Monuments, memorials, and statues are not intended to be useful. They are erected to men who have been useful and who have served their country well. [Applause.] You want this roadway from here to Gettysburg. Why select the field of carnage to perpetuate the memory of the man who loved peace so well [applause]; the one who said at the Hampton Roads conference, "Write union at the top and anything else under it." He wanted to avoid the dread conflict, and I believe this House will not do its duty to the memory of this great Kentuckian, this great Illinoisan, this great American, this great patriot if you allow yourselves to be diverted from your solemn purpose to erect a memorial to him to start a public-road movement or trifle with it in any such way as that. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the man who erects a republic deserves a lasting place in the affections of men. But who is prepared to say that even the man who erects a republic is greater than the man who saves a republic? [Applause.] For those who have enjoyed the freedom and opportunity that liberty gives suffer more when it is taken from them than those who have never known of its glories. [Applause.]

Kentucky gave to the South Jefferson Davis, who stood at the head of a patriot army, which for courage and sincerity finds no counterpart in all the annals of war. [Applause.] Lincoln stood at the head of another patriot army, inspired by love of country. The war is over. Let us perpetuate the memory of Abraham Lincoln as befits his life and his deeds. But let me say here and now that, though some would trifle with it and use it as a public-roads propaganda, yet—

Till the future dares forget the past, his fate and fame shall be an echo and a light unto eternity.

[Long-continued applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I have agreed that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] may yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the memorial as proposed by the committee which has had the matter in charge. [Applause.] I naturally feel a hesitancy in differing with the gentleman from Ohio, Gen. SHERWOOD, who played such a conspicuous part as a Union soldier during the war between the States. I do not wish to play the hypocrite, nor profess to have that in me which is not there. I am the son of a Confederate soldier, and it is the proudest fact of my life that my father bore an honorable part in that great struggle for local self-government. Above my desk in the House Office Building hangs a picture of Jefferson Davis. At his feet when a boy I sat as at the feet of Gamaliel and learned the story of the Confederacy and the principles for which it stood. As a young man, when I stood at the altar with her who was to be the partner of my life, Jefferson Davis stood with us, and when the ceremony ended he placed his hands upon our heads and said, "God bless you, my children."

These are memories which I cherish, Mr. Speaker, and shall hand down a rich legacy to my children.

The great war ended 50 years ago, and, thank God, the thoughts of men have broadened with the process of the suns. In 1861 my father followed the Stars and Bars and wore the gray. In 1898 I followed the Stars and Stripes and wore the blue. [Applause.] I believe that I was right in 1898, and I as surely believe that he was right in 1861.

We are here to-day engaged in a high and lofty purpose. Abraham Lincoln needs no memorial. We can add nothing to his fame, nor can we subtract one jot or tittle from it. He and Jefferson Davis, Ulysses S. Grant, and Robert E. Lee must stand before the bar of history upon the record of their deeds done in the body, and each alike must abide its judgment. I have little respect for him on either side the line who fears that final verdict.

Those were bloody years, mad with strife and sad with the suffering and travail of a weeping people; but we should not forget them. We should rather teach our children to emulate the deeds of those who bore the brunt of battle and bowed beneath the awful burdens of State. I believe he reads his country's history with little understanding who can not catch an inspiration to patriotism from every battle field in this Republic. [Applause.] We have erected monuments throughout the North to the Union soldiers. We have erected monuments throughout the South to the Confederate soldiers; but the labor of love is not yet completed.

Mr. Speaker, I was in Quebec a few years ago and visited the Plains of Abraham. Two hundred years ago the British, under Wolfe, and the French, under Montcalm, fought on that battle field for the mastery of Canada. Upon it to-day there stands a monument erected by the descendants of those who fought under Wolfe and the descendants of those who fought under Montcalm. On it is inscribed this legend:

To Wolfe and Montcalm. Valor gave them a common death; history gave them a common fame; posterity gave them a common monument.

Speaking as far as I may speak for those whose hopes went out at Appomattox, I stand ready to vote for such a monument on every battle field of the Republic to commemorate the heroism of those who there gave up their precious lives, whether they wore the blue or whether they wore the gray. [Applause.]

I believe we are beginning such a monument here to-day, although this resolution provides for only half of it. The monument we are building is to Abraham Lincoln, the embodiment of all for which the Union soldier fought and won. Across the river, as I believe, upon the sacred soil of old Virginia, in the near future another monument will arise to the memory of Jefferson Davis, who was the embodiment of all for which the Confederate soldier fought and lost. For such a monument I believe no price could be too high; for such a purpose I believe that no money can be ill spent.

I think it ought to be beautiful. I would not stain the even virtue of our enterprise by exchanging the inspiration of the artist for the sordid commercialism of the road builder. [Applause.]

I believe it ought to be beautiful, beautiful enough to be worthy the high commission we will give it, a commission to tell the ages yet to come how soon it was that happy day rolled around, foretold in the prophetic language of Lincoln, "When the mystic chords of memory stretching from every battle field and patriot's grave to every heart and hearthstone all over this broad land would again swell the chorus of the Union when touched, as they surely have been touched, by the better angels of our nature." [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I will read myself, as I think the Clerk will have difficulty in reading it:

In line 10 strike out the word "approve" and insert "disapprove, and that a memorial arch on Sixteenth Street at a suitable point north of the intersection of U Street and Sixteenth Street, at a cost not to exceed $2,000,000, be erected instead of the building provided by the commission."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the amendment on the theory that it has been reported by the Clerk.

Mr. SIMS. I read it myself because I thought the Clerk might have difficulty in reading it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule that the Clerk read it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, no one in this House has more reverence for the characteristic qualities of Abraham Lincoln that made him worthy of our memory than I have.

What were the characteristics of Abraham Lincoln? Do you wish the future to have an idea of what the man was? Shall whatever we erect here as a memorial to him be a reflection of the man, so that it may be educational as well as ornamental? How did he start in life, and where? The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], the eloquent Senator-to-be, told you he was born in Kentucky, in a log cabin. What next do we hear of Abraham Lincoln? That he was a rail splitter; and I have a kindly feeling for any man who ever split rails. The next thing we hear of him was his championship of human rights, regardless of the color of the human being. From this humble beginning in the log cabin he rose to the highest office in the land. What do all these things suggest to our minds? Born in a log cabin, being a rail splitter, then becoming the great champion of human rights. Will it be to those things that we will recur when we look upon an artistic heathen temple, however beautiful it may be, erected in a reclaimed frog pond? God made Abraham Lincoln, and let us place his memorial on a God-made hill, where the mosquitoes and the frogs will not bother and annoy those who come to look upon it. I have little patience with using that name to promote any other purpose than the purpose for which it ought to be used; that is, to bring back to us in vivid recollection the man and what he was to his country, what he was as a citizen, and what he was when he died. Does your heathen temple suggest Lincoln in any phase of his useful life?

We can not get away from the thought suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT], who charged, perhaps truthfully, that the road to Gettysburg would be used for purposes least suggestive of the life and character of Abraham Lincoln—show places, automobile races, and things of that sort. I am just as far from wanting to do things by indirection as any man in this House. I say if we are going to undertake to build public highways at national expense, let us go boldly about it, but I have as little patience with the location of this memorial in Potomac Park, in order that it may be used as an argument to build a magnificent automobile driveway from that park to Rock Creek Park, and on out to the Soldiers' Home, where it will be beyond the common use of a poor man, like Abraham Lincoln was in his early days, available only to the wealthy who can afford such things as automobiles and carriages. I do not mean to insinuate that the honorable committee that reported this bill or that the commission had any such thought and purpose, but this location is being contended for and promoted by some men who want it more as an excuse for building a great automobile driveway, than as a suitable and desirable place for a memorial to Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. Speaker, I have looked all over Washington, and I find nowhere in this city a memorial arch or an arch of any kind. The Washington Monument stands to the south of the White House. Here is a great avenue from the doors of the White House running north to the District boundary, one of the finest in this city. Along its course are many hills made by the Creator who made Lincoln, elevations higher by far than any proposed artificial mound to be erected in Potomac Park out of soil removed from other places and piled up in that mosquito-breeding swamp formerly known as the Potomac Flats. Why not place out on that great avenue on one of those splendid nature-built hills, a great monumental arch, as provided for in my amendment, not costing over $2,000,000 so as to keep it within the appropriation? Then upon that great arch, from one end to the other, place the log cabin; place the rail splitter on the top of a rail cut with the ax in his hands; place him there laboring for the freedom of the slave; place him in a miniature White House as President of this great Nation—and then you will have an inspiring object lesson to the youth of this country.

You can point to the boy born in the log cabin who, on account of his belief in right doing, ended his days on earth in the White House. It will be memorializing this great man in a way everyone will approve. Then there is one further thing to commend this location. There is no real estate speculative scheme that can connect itself with this memorial arch on Sixteenth Street. Of course any improvement on any street of any kind affects values near by it, but that part of the District has already been exploited. The property has been all bought and sold so often that the speculative opportunities are about all gone. Within two squares of that magnificent avenue runs Fourteenth Street, with street car lines. What poor persons that Lincoln loved so well will see his monument, or how often will they see it if placed down in that reclaimed frog pond, or how many will go over the proposed driveway from it and through Rock Creek Park to the Soldiers' Home? No; the people whom Lincoln loved and served in his lifetime will rarely ever see it. It takes their entire time in this high-priced town to make enough to buy the necessaries of life on which to live. With that great arch across that great avenue the poorest man, the poorest woman, the poorest boy in the city of Washington can go of his own accord, can go within two blocks by street cars and walk over and look at that magnificent memorial portraying to the youth of this country the possibilities of a great, free Republic. What will your Greek temple suggest to anybody that will be a benefit to the future generations of this country? Then there will not be any competition, as it were, between the Washington Monument and this proposed memorial arch as a monument to another great American citizen, erected on Sixteenth Street, in another and noncontiguous portion of the city.

By adopting my amendment we will have a memorial erected to Abraham Lincoln where the greatest opportunity will be afforded to people to see it, both those who live here and those who visit this Capital, both rich and poor.

Mr. Speaker, let us extend that memorial arch across this great avenue, and on it let there be placed such statues as may be necessary to bring to the lively remembrance of everyone who sees it those deeds in his life that made Abraham Lincoln what he was to this Nation. The arch can be as artistic as a Greek temple, and in purpose, design, and effect on the high land of Sixteenth Street it certainly will far exceed anything which can be placed down in Potomac Park. Besides, it will be no promoter's excuse to put off on the Government a lot of almost valueless real estate at high prices. The highway to Gettysburg could be used by the poor man, could be used by the wayfarer, could be used by the automobilists, could be used by the dray and the cart, but anybody who goes to this Potomac Park must use a carriage or automobile. There are no street cars approaching it, and you practically risk your life if you go down there afoot; if you are not a pretty good hand, pretty expert in the use of your legs, you will be in danger of your life. But instead of putting up anything in frog land, put it where everybody can see it who wants to, without the rich man's resources, without cost, where are the facilities of street car service, the cheapest form of transportation available to the poor, so that to them it will be an inspiration for all time to come, and in the erection of which no real estate scandal can possibly develop.

Let Lincoln's memorial be placed on the highest ground in the District, where the first ray of sun will wreath his brow in the morning and the last ray will light up that kindly face in the evening.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. Eighteen minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] and reserve the balance.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee yields 15 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] and reserves the balance of his time.

[Mr. SAUNDERS addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. PICKETT. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NYE]. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NYE] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. NYE. Mr. Speaker, this should be a memorial of peace and not of war. While I was first attracted somewhat by the scheme to build a road to Gettysburg, America's great Austerlitz, upon further and more serious reflection I have concluded that that would be a mistake. I am disposed to look with a great deal of favor personally upon the idea suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP]. I think if Mr. Lincoln could speak to us to-day he would say that he would give the poor boys like himself an opportunity for at least a primary education. But I believe that as the question stands to-day none of these measures will be considered, probably, under the rules, and the question is, Shall we have a memorial after half a century, in which the life and memory and character of this great man have been sacredly cherished in the hearts of the American people? I think it has been wisely ordered that considerable time should elapse in which we might witness, as we have, the blending of the blue and the gray, and see men on both sides of this House unite in their earnest purpose to erect now, or as soon as possible, a suitable memorial to the western world's greatest patriot and greatest lover of mankind. [Applause.]

I say that this should be a memorial of peace and not of war. We should not be reminded so much of the physical and awful struggle between neighbors and brothers of half a century ago on that field as we should of that love which springs from the better impulse of our national life, which is at least latent in our national heart and which was personified in the life and character of Abraham Lincoln. This universal love of mankind, this paternal affection for mankind and his country enabled him to lead us out of the thick darkness of our national distress into the bright light of perpetual peace, I trust, and of lasting prosperity as a people. [Applause.] And I firmly believe that this man was so universal in his character that we may rejoice at this day to find a united country and a united House in their devotion to his memory. Have you ever noticed, as you have studied that immortal oration at Gettysburg, that he was a man too great to be affected even by the partisanship of war? So broad and parental was his love that his references on that field were to "the men who died here," "the men who sleep here." He did not even say then "the Union soldier," "the man in blue," or "the man in gray." It was a parental love, and he was large enough to see that under the infinite providence of God that terrible and mournful struggle was perhaps necessary in the evolution of our race and in the perpetuation of our institutions, and by reason of that broad, universal, and parental love he rose from that terrible night of conflict, at last holding aloft in mournful triumph the flag, not of a section, but of a nation, and the greatest Nation under God's blue sky. [Applause.]

I am for perpetuating the idea which dominated the great and masterful life of Abraham Lincoln. He knew in his great heart that love moves the world, that it is next to the heart of the Infinite. He came from the wilderness of the South. His heart in all that agony was as much with his neighbors of the South as his conscience was with the cause of human freedom contended for at the North.

For four long years, in agony and pain, he held one hand in the North and one in the South, and finally bound them together by his unselfish devotion to the cause of human liberty and an enduring Union. [Applause.]

It was not to celebrate a momentary victory or the heroism of the forces of one side in the conflict that he made that great speech. That speech was made that we might consecrate ourselves anew, as he said, to the cause of freedom and to the perpetuation of the Nation—a Nation dedicated to the principle that all men are equal. It was a prophecy of a new birth in freedom and a pledge that this new Nation that holds the hope of the world should not perish from the earth.

Mr. Speaker, let us build a beautiful memorial, not to the physical man, not to the battle field, not to perpetuate the memory of past antagonisms, but to symbolize that larger national love which Lincoln manifested to the world, without which all nations are but the passing pageant of an hour. [Applause.]

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with profit and pleasure to gentlemen who have spoken in the interest of good roads and to those who have favored a suitable memorial to Abraham Lincoln. I have gone upon record as a friend of good roads. I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture, and that committee reported during the last session a bill which carried an appropriation of more than $14,000,000 for the improvement and construction of public highways in the United States. I contributed in my humble way, Mr. Speaker, toward the passage of that bill through this House. As gentlemen here will recall, that bill died in the Senate. I am an advocate of good roads, and if I live I propose to continue in the Sixty-third Congress to plead for Government aid for public-roads building in the United States; but I do not have to vote now for a road from Washington to Gettysburg in order to convince the country that I am a friend of the good-roads movement. [Applause.]

There is a time for all things, the Good Book tells us, and this is the time for the Representatives of the American people to speak for and vote for a memorial temple to be erected in the capital of this Nation to the memory of Abraham Lincoln. [Applause.] What more appropriate place could be selected for the building of a monument to Abraham Lincoln than in the capital of the Nation? Here Representatives in Congress from the South and from the North discussed the great issues that were ultimately settled by the arbitrament of the sword. It was here that southern Representatives announced to the Nation the secession of their States, and from this capital went to cast their fortunes with their States on the field of war. Here Lincoln presided as President during that bloody conflict between the States. Here he received the good tidings that the war was over, and here that he rejoiced when the dove of peace brought an olive branch from Appomattox [applause], and here that his eyes glowed with the joyous vision of a reunited country. [Applause.] It was here that he said, "Let us all work together now to restore these States to their places in the great Union of States." [Applause.] Here, Mr. Speaker, that he breathed his last, to the great loss and deep sorrow of the South and the whole country. [Applause.]

Had he lived the South would never have known the horrors of reconstruction. [Applause.] The despised carpetbagger would never have been noted in the annals of southern history. [Applause.] The whole country suffered by his death, but the South suffered most. [Applause.] Had he lived the two sections, bravely fighting for what they believed to be right, would have been bound together sooner in the ties of everlasting love and union. [Applause.] Lincoln is the common heritage of our common country, and the South delights to honor his name. [Applause.] No section of our country takes more pride in this Capital of a reunited people than does the brave and chivalrous South. [Applause.] The war had to come. It took the war to settle the question of secession, and never until Lee surrendered to Grant at Appomattox and the names of these two brave generals passed into the Valhalla of American fame was the right to secede withdrawn from the States. [Applause.] Here Lincoln presided as President through that stormy period; here he breathed his last, and to this place the hearts of a sorrowing people turned at the sad news of his death; and here let us build a lasting monument to his memory. [Applause.]

No, Mr. Speaker, no automobile boulevard from Washington to Gettysburg will suffice to perpetuate the memory of Lincoln. [Applause.] Out yonder is Gettysburg, the scene of one of the bloodiest battles in human history. Monuments are erected there to the memory of those who fought on opposing sides. We have Gettysburg now, and we have a way to reach it, but, Mr. Speaker, we have no appropriate memorial in the city of Washington to the name of Abraham Lincoln. [Applause.] Let us erect here in this beautiful Capital City a magnificent temple to his memory.

In a few moments the tourist can view the entire magnificent memorial temple and carry it back home photographed upon his memory, but if he desired to see a highway builded from Washington to Gettysburg he would have to travel 90 miles in order to have a complete view of the entire memorial. I shall cast my vote in favor of a memorial temple to be erected in the Capital of our country to the memory of Abraham Lincoln. [Applause.]

Surrounded by poverty when a boy and with but little of the aid afforded by letters, he buffeted the waves of ill luck and ill fortune and rose superior to all opposing forces and achieved the highest office within the gift of a proud and patriotic people. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, in the years to come southern boys and northern boys, eastern boys and western boys, thrilled with patriotic emotions, will stand around this temple in solemn meditation and catch inspiration as they ponder the story of his eventful life. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT].

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, my home and my occupation for a part of the time that President Lincoln was a great factor in making history are a little embarrassing to me. If the plan of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] should obtain, the Lincoln highway would go through a part of my congressional district, and I think that is a part of the most beautiful land on earth. It would be a benefit to some of the very best people that ever breathed the breath of life. I have tried all I could to find out exactly what I ought to do in relation to this proposition. I do not think because I represent my own beautiful country that I should vote for this proposition of the highway unless it is right, and I have so stated. In the brief time allowed me I want to state that the construction of the highway is the only thing to do. If you could cross the Great Divide and say to Lincoln that we are determined to erect a memorial to him, befitting his public services and life and character, and ask him to make a selection, I am quite sure that he would say to construct the highway.

Mr. Speaker, what will the highway do? It is the connecting link between the field of the greatest battle ever fought and the National Capital, from which it was directed. It will be the road, strange to say, along which the Union veterans marched, and they had to interpose themselves between the grandest army—Gen. Lee's army—so far as bravery and fighting qualities are concerned, that the world ever saw, and this Capital.

It is not worth while to discuss the Battle of Gettysburg. It has been talked about and written about, and will be as long as the world stands. There is only one thing about it, I will say to my southern friends. We failed. The South failed at Gettysburg, and that is all there is to it—and there was the sunset of our ambition. Now, what in the world can be more appropriate than to construct a great highway from Washington to Gettysburg in memory of this great man. We are united, we are happy, we are a great Nation; and if we have done anything against each other for which we are sorry, we have forgiven each other.

Why not do the sensible thing and vote for this memorial from Washington to Gettysburg? We all have agreed that Abraham Lincoln was in public life, perhaps, the greatest humanitarian of his day. He was a plain character, a plain man, and I will repeat, if you could cross the Great Divide and reach him where he is and where he ought to be and say to him that we would like to do something to perpetuate the memory of his life and character and services for this land of ours, he would say at first, no; that he wanted nothing from any of us; that his life and character and services to his land were enough for him; but he would also say that if we had made up our minds to spend money, then that he wanted us to spend it in the way that would do the most good for the people of the country that he loved so well. That would be his message to us.

I have seen boats rowed around Pennsylvania Avenue and Sixth Street because of floods from the Potomac River, and you have got, perhaps, to meet that emergency if you place the memorial there.

Why, Mr. Speaker, this is the Mecca for all the people who can afford to visit this beautiful city and who want to see what is going on. They come to Washington. Do you want them to go home and say, "Oh, I saw the Lincoln memorial down here on a place that was flooded"? The best report for the returned visitor to make of his impression of Washington is, "I have traveled the Lincoln highway to the greatest battle field of the war, where the greatest generals, where the bravest soldiers, fought each other; I traveled it, and there"—if he is a southern man he will say—"I saw where Pickett charged and broke the line." If he is a northern man he will say, "I saw where Hancock fell, I saw where Sickles fell," and so on down the line. If you want to do a great thing, my countrymen, on the floor of this House, and you want to do a popular thing, connect this Capital City with the greatest battle field in the history of warfare; spend your money in that way. "Oh," says my friend HEFLIN, of Alabama, "it is a boulevard for automobiles." The man who has an automobile is going to ride, anyhow.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I would like to have one minute additional.

Mr. BORLAND. I yield one minute to the gentleman.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I want to say that you can not do a more fitting or a more glorious thing than to construct a road from the great Capital of the Nation to the great battle field of the Nation.

I thank you all, Mr. Speaker, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment there can be but two good reasons given for the appropriating of public money for the construction of a monument or memorial to any individual.

One is that the character of and the services rendered by the individual were so exalted and beneficial to the people that the Representatives of the people are justified in appropriating public money for the construction of a monument or memorial commemorating the life and services of the individual.

The other reason—and which, in my opinion, is the stronger—is that such monument or memorial will tend to aid in the education and the enlightenment of the people.

I am opposed to the construction of a highway from Washington to Gettysburg in this instance, for, in my judgment, it would fail to serve, either as a monument to Abraham Lincoln or tend to aid in the education of our people.

Such a road truly would serve a certain purpose. It would make a nice driveway for those who can afford to enjoy themselves by traveling over the country in automobiles. But so far as being a memorial to Abraham Lincoln it would be a complete failure; for there would not be anything along this highway that would be suggestive of the life and services of Abraham Lincoln, save and except here and there an old Virginia rail fence, which might call to the mind of one familiar with the life of Mr. Lincoln that he once split rails in Illinois, and even this suggestion would be destroyed by the commercial advertising on the board fences and sign boards along the way, such as "Smoke Bull Durham," "Drink refreshing and invigorating Budweiser beer," and so forth, which would become matters of comment by the joy riders as they sped along this highway, which alone to the historian and the automobile driver for profit would be known and recognized as the Lincoln memorial highway.

Mr. Speaker, to advocate such a proposition is, to my mind, treating the name of Abraham Lincoln irreverently.

Is this what the American people want done in honor of Abraham Lincoln? Surely not. For, Mr. Speaker, if there is any American for whom a monument should be erected, solely as a matter of love and respect to his memory, that man is Abraham Lincoln, for his life and achievements furnish us the most striking illustration of the possibilities of American citizenship. He demonstrated that in this land of ours, without wealth or social position, it is possible for an American boy with energy and a good heart to win the highest honor within the gift of our people.

Washington, Jefferson, and many others have added brilliant pages to our history, and we love and revere their memory; but they were the children of fortune and social position, while Lincoln was the child of poverty and acquainted with adversity. Surely it is an inspiration to think of the life of this great man; to follow him in his career from his cabin home in old Kentucky, thence as a boy, with his pioneer father, to the wilderness of Indiana; thence to Illinois, from which State he came to this city as the Chief Executive of our Nation; and here for four long years, with sorrowful heart but with fixed purpose, he held aloft above the dark clouds of civil conflict the flag of our Union. And when the dove of peace had once more returned to our stricken country and the great armies that had battled for supremacy were about to disband and return to their homes in the North and the Southland, to become citizens once more of a peaceful and united country, Lincoln, who had borne the greatest burden of it all, was stricken down by the assassin and died without a word. The obscurity of his birth, the hardship and sorrow of his life, and his tragic and untimely death combine to form the most pathetic tragedy this world has witnessed since our Savior staggered and fell beneath his cross at Calvary.

Construct a road as a memorial to this man. Oh, no. Connect his name with Gettysburg, once the scene of bloodshed and carnage. No. For the mention of Gettysburg recalls one of the saddest incidents in our history. Lincoln, the great lover of peace, whose soul shuddered at the thought of war, should not be connected by memorial with any battlefield, but here in this city, the capital of the Nation, where he suffered and died, should be constructed a magnificent monument which should stand alone, distinct, sublime, and which should be a tribute of love from the American people.

It is true it will cost something; it can not be used by anyone, and it should not; but it should simply stand as a monument to his life and services, and it should be of such imposing character that the thousands of students who visit this city annually, as they stand and gaze upon it in all its simple grandeur, will go away impressed with the thought that it portrays the strength and beauty of the character of Abraham Lincoln. I have but little patience with those who argue that Lincoln was a plain and unostentatious man and that this is a waste of money and that it had better be expended in a way that will be for the pleasure and convenience of at least a part of our people. Those who make the argument fail to conceive the real purpose of this monument. This monument, in my judgment, as I said before, should be erected simply as a memorial to this great man and for no other purpose. There are always present those who object to the expense or waste. We are told that when Martha brought the precious ointment to annoint her Master some complained and said that it should be sold and the money given to the poor. But that was Martha's tribute of love. So this monument to Abraham Lincoln should represent the tribute of love of his countrymen.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, as a citizen of Illinois and one who reveres the memory of Abraham Lincoln, and one who has ofttimes stood at his tomb at Springfield, Ill., where his ashes rest in peace, in the name of the citizenship of that great Commonwealth that stood loyally by Lincoln in the hours of his greatest trial, I beg of you to stamp with your disapproval any proposition that tends to connect the name of this great man with any utilitarian purpose under the guise of constructing something to his honor.

Far better leave him alone in his glory. His fame is secure. No act of ours can add to the glory of his splendid career. No monument of granite or bronze is needed to perpetuate the story of his life and achievements through the coming centuries. As long as men love liberty and believe in the equality of man the name of Abraham Lincoln will shine with steady and increasing luster, and the erection of the proposed monument on the bank of the Potomac is not for the purpose of perpetuating his name, but simply to show our love and appreciation of his life and services.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I suppose it will be admitted by everyone that in case a majority vote was required to determine any architectural design in the world, where there are a number of competing plans, it would be impossible to secure a majority, and that consequently nothing would be done. The history of competitions in architectural memorials prove this to be true. The Washington Monument for half a century after it had been started remained incomplete. Half a century has elapsed since the death of Lincoln, and we have done nothing. There are many suitable forms which a memorial may take, and they appeal differently to many different minds, and there is only one way in which we can ever erect a memorial of any kind, and that is for some men to yield to the taste of others. The present situation shows the truth of the old saying, "de gustibus non disputandum." So one may think a bridge is the fittest monument, another an arch, another a pyramid, another an obelisk. Then there are all sorts and descriptions of statues which may better please the taste of others. We have come to a period in the history of a Lincoln memorial when it is time to act. We have chosen a Fine Arts Commission to advise us, and that commission is unanimous. The Congress of the United States has appointed a commission consisting of the President of the United States, the Speaker of this House, and distinguished Senators and Congressmen, and they have presented a unanimous report. Under these circumstances I for one feel that it is necessary to subordinate my own desire or my own project or my own taste to the taste of what is evidently the majority of those best qualified to pass on such a question. Two years ago, when this question first came before the Library Committee, I was opposed to this design. Two years' careful study of the entire subject, and after having had hearings before the Library Committee upon this subject, makes me perfectly clear on this proposition: That the majority of the people of the United States who have made a special study of artistic matters are satisfied with the memorial proposed by the Fine Arts Commission. The proposal comes within the amount authorized for the memorial. The cost of the Bacon design is $1,750,000, which will leave an ample margin for the preparation of the grounds and the planting suitable to the design.

Captious criticism is passed on every artistic design, and it seems to be impossible to avoid it. The greatest works of art have been subject at times to ridicule. I call the attention of the House to what happened in regard to the Washington Monument, and what I shall say of that monument I say on the assumption that there is not a man in this House who does not appreciate the lesson that that monument teaches. As a great judge of art has said:

It is gray in the dawn, brilliant in the sunlight, black in the thunderstorm, pink in the afterglow, mysterious in the moonlight, vanishing in the mist, lost in the clouds—always majestic stands the memorial to the Father of his Country. In the sunlight and shadow, thunderstorm and mist, in the clouds and in the clear sky, against the golden sunrise and the red sunset, against the midday sky of blue and the midnight sky scintillating with stars, against the bright white clouds and the dark gray clouds, moving with the wind, bowing to the warmth of the sun, receiving the lightning's stroke, ever changing, it is always stately, always beautiful.

Yet adverse criticism was common years ago. In the North American Review of March, 1816, in discussing what was necessary for a design for the Monument, an author demanded a statue by capable American artists and derided the imitation of ancient models, and the author says:

If an architectural monument is resolved upon, the principal forms are the pyramid, the obelisk, the triumphal arch, and the columns. The two former were peculiar to the Egyptians and may be considered beyond the power of any modern nation.

In 1879, in an article in the American Architect, we find this sentence in regard to the Washington Monument:

The ugliest monument in the world is in a fair way to be completed.

In the same journal of December 13, 1884, we find these words:

There is some satisfaction in reflecting that the United States possesses the tallest building in the world, but when this is said there will be little else about the Monument of which we can be proud.

W. W. Story, himself a noted sculptor, in protesting against the obelisk, said:

This form of architecture is the refuge of incompetency. In architecture when an architect is incompetent he resorts to the obelisk.

An article in the Atlantic Monthly of April, 1879, referred to the "puerile character of the design" and to "clinging to an obsolete idea."

The debates in the House of Representatives on the final appropriations for the Washington Monument are likewise instructive. On August 2, 1876, a joint commission, as in the present case, was created by Congress, and that commission reported unanimously in favor of completing the obelisk on the site on which it was begun. On April 2, 1878, there was an interesting debate upon the floor of this House as to the location of the Monument. It was said to be in a swamp; that is worse than saying it is down "by the brewery." A gentleman from Michigan wanted the Monument placed upon solid ground at the soldiers' home. The brilliant Cox, of New York, known as Sunset Cox, said:

One thing is very sure, and that is, that if that Monument is ever finished it will be as unsightly as it is to-day; it is not the kind of a monument we should erect in this city in the memory of George Washington.

Mr. Clymer, of Pennsylvania, said:

It is a meaningless shaft. There is nothing in the past like it.

A Congressman from Maryland moved that the Monument be transferred to Baltimore. It would be useless to further quote from that debate. We have heard it all over again this afternoon; the same differences of tastes, the same wildness and crudity of statement, the same inappreciation of the beautiful in art, and the same appeal to the great unwashed.

Now, one word as to the practical value of this Monument. A monument in its very nature has no material value, and ought not to have. It ceases to be a monument when the latter is its predominating characteristic. For that very reason anything that is used every day can never be a memorial in the sense in which our race has raised memorials to its dead in all the past ages. A memorial which speaks of a man should bring to men the lesson of his life at a glance. It should not be something that will enable us to put money in our pockets or to save money.

A memorial is not an economic proposition—it is the payment of a debt of gratitude; it is a recognition of the example of greatness; it is a lesson to the youth of the land. To turn such an object to profit is prostitution, if not sacrilege. But our opponents especially love to dwell on the phrase "Greek temple," and to speak of Lincoln within that temple as a "Greek god," and some of them ask for American architecture as though there were such a thing. If the Greek temple is inappropriate for Lincoln, because it is Greek, then the Capitol in which we stand is inappropriate for us because its dome is Roman. If the argument for the road is good, let us tear down the Capitol building and build an up-to-date Chicago or New York skyscraper of 20 stories. The great styles of buildings were all discovered before America was discovered, and we to-day must and do adopt these styles to our changing needs, and that is the purpose of great architecture. You might just as well object to the use of marble for sculpture because the Greeks used it, and ask why haven't we got some American metal or material out of which sculptures can be made. You might just as well object to pictures being painted in oil or water colors and ask why haven't we got some American material out of which pictures can be made. It is said by some that there is no connection between this magnificent monument and the character of Abraham Lincoln. Such a person must have a very singular concept of art. Of all the forms of architecture in existence the simplest, the plainest, and the most magnificent is the Grecian. All of these qualities should recall Abraham Lincoln. The acme of Greek art is the Parthenon at Athens—the acme of the art of the people who developed the idea of federal power. It was Greek political and statesmenlike genius which welded together the idea of local sovereignty with a State that should be a unit to the rest of the world. The fundamental idea in the American Constitution is unity to the outside world but diversity of local powers among the States. Jefferson pointed out the analogy. Our Government is founded upon a Greek concept of statesmanship. To no other Nation could we look so well for forms that symbolize liberty and majesty and simplicity as to Greek architecture. And what three adjectives so suit Abraham Lincoln—liberty, majesty, and simplicity.

Certainly as grand a sight as the eyes of men can rest upon meets the traveler as he sails up the Aegean and enters the Piraeus and beholds the Acropolis crowned by a Greek temple. For over a thousand years that view has been the admiration of the Nations of the earth. It has done more to teach mankind the lesson of Greek civilization than any other scene in the world; it has done more to keep green the memory of Greek life than Marathon or Leuctra, or any road that the Greek may have built or than anything else that the Greeks ever did.

And it is now proposed here in Washington that we should erect a memorial to Abraham Lincoln as majestic, as simple, and as breathing the spirit of liberty which shall call the attention of succeeding ages to the second great period in our national existence and form a real and personal memorial of one of our two greatest national heroes.

Finally, there is but one question for us to-day. Shall we erect a monument to Abraham Lincoln or shall we not? It is preposterous to talk of a road in memory of Lincoln, because no road could be in memory of Lincoln. The men who talk about the Appian Way know nothing of Appius Claudius, but these selfsame men, when they behold Trajan's Column, or the arch of Septimus Severus or the arch of Constantine, are forced to remember these Roman emperors personally, and the reason is that these monuments are personal memorials and a road is a convenience. But the project is impracticable for other reasons. It will cost at least $20,000,000 to build a really distinctive road from Washington to Gettysburg, and such a road would have to be protected for hundreds of feet on both sides to prevent road houses and other places of objectionable amusement from abutting upon it and becoming its principal feature, and finally such a road could be used only by those who could afford automobiles or carriages. If a trolley line was placed upon it so that the plain people could use it, it would be valuable and useful and, perhaps, something that we ought to do, but it would not be a memorial of Abraham Lincoln. It would not be a work of art, it would be a problem of transportation. The Washington Monument cost $1,250,000; it would cost to-day probably $2,000,000. The talk of building an adequate monument in Washington and adding a road to it is simply to add an additional cost to the $2,000,000 already authorized, and it would in no wise add to the memory or glory of Abraham Lincoln. It might sell more rubber tires; it might be a benefit to the automobile interest; it might help the real estate interests; and I am saying none of these things with invidious meaning; it might do all of these things, but it would not perpetuate the memory of Abraham Lincoln. The question therefore is narrowed to this, Shall we set aside the unanimous finding of the Fine Arts Commission; shall we set aside the unanimous report of the Lincoln Memorial Commission, appointed under resolutions of the Senate and House of Representatives; shall we set aside the unanimous report of your committee and the bill which has passed the Senate? Shall we begin another 50 years of contest between artists over various forms of memorials, or shall we settle the matter by accepting the best authority that we have and in a few years place at the end of the Mall a monument unsurpassed in the art of the world, a monument in majesty and beauty of surrounding surpassing the Deutsches Ecke, where the Moselle flows into the Rhine, the Arc de Triumph in Paris, or the Garibaldi Memorial in Italy, and I believe the most magnificent testimony which the art of the world has ever raised in memory of any great man.

The monument to Lincoln, whatever its form, should be superlative of its kind.

John Hay said—I wish I could give his exact words—to a member of the Arts Commission: "The monument to Lincoln should not be in the rush of life, but a thing apart to which the American people would go for silent contemplation of the great qualities and character to which that monument is raised."

Gentlemen, we do not want the sensation of the joy rider connected with the thought of Lincoln in the minds of our American youth, but rather the catching of the breath in reverent awe, as when one enters the majestic silence of a great cathedral, where, within beautified silence, one may contemplate the qualities of heart and mind which go to make a great American.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, while I would like to see a memorial road running from Washington to Gettysburg, and would even extend that road, as a national peace memorial, from Washington to Richmond, I intend to vote for the Lincoln memorial as recommended by the Committee on Library. Desirable as the Washington-Gettysburg road would be, it is evident that to substitute it now for the beautiful and stately structure proposed to be erected on the Mall in the Capital City would indefinitely postpone the memorial which the people have it in their hearts to erect to Lincoln.

Moreover, the defeat of the memorial plan as proposed by the Fine Arts Commission would start an unseemly controversy that would not do credit to our intelligence as Representatives of the people.

As a Pennsylvanian I would like to see a road to Gettysburg. If it is to be a memorial road, Congress could erect it without necessarily committing itself to a general good-roads construction propaganda. It could extend that memorial road to Richmond likewise without binding itself to assume the cost of goods roads in the various States or such roads as may be interstate, but is this the time to inject the good roads or even the memorial road proposition?

We have before us a resolution providing "Approving the plan, design, and location for a Lincoln memorial." The resolution contemplates the expenditure of $2,000,000 on a definite plan, a plan which involves the erection on the banks of the Potomac of a monumental structure close by the scenes of Lincoln's greatest activities and immediately across the way from Arlington, the former home of Gen. Lee. It is to be a fitting memorial upon hallowed ground in the official heart of the Nation.

In supporting the memorial as proposed, I am not opposing a memorial road to Gettysburg. I am supporting the proposition that is fairly and appropriately before the House. I want a great national memorial to the immortal Lincoln. The memorial road should not now be permitted to interfere with that worthy and patriotic project. Let us have the memorial first. The road project can be considered later.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, my contribution to this debate is not an original expression of opinion, but a remarkable newspaper editorial that was printed in the Sunday Globe, of Boston, Mass., on the anniversary of the birthday of Abraham Lincoln, February 12, 1911.

The editorial is signed "Dudley," the nom de plume of Mr. James Morgan, who has contributed essays of real literary value that ought to be remembered long after the things usually printed in a daily newspaper are forever forgotten.

The title of the editorial is "Two boys." It follows:

The birth of a baby boy was hailed as the greatest event of the year 1811. His first little wail was heard round a waiting and listening world on a March morning 100 years ago.

All Paris had stopped and pricked up its ears to catch the news. The vast palace of the Tuileries was filled with eager watchers. For 24 painful hours the expectant mother labored and her agonized cries rang through the great halls. The father, hero of mighty battles, fled in terror from the chamber of suffering. At last the child was safely delivered.

Cannon boomed the joyous news from their iron throats. The immense crowds in the streets counted the reports—20, 21. Was that all? Then it must be a girl. But hark! There sounded the twenty-second. It was a boy. Whereat thousands screamed their delight, till the roar of the cannon was almost drowned as they belched forth the rest of their 101 salutes for the baby. A balloonist sailed away from the rejoicing city to scatter printed bulletins of the wonderful occurrence throughout the country.

A KING IN THE CRADLE.

While Paris held carnival with gay processions by day and brilliant fireworks by night, messengers sped on relays of horses to bear the great news to distant capitals.

All the nations of Europe had been drawn together in mutual suspense. To some the boy was a herald of peace, while to others, the foes of his father's ambition, his advent carried discouragement or consternation. None remained indifferent to an event seemingly so momentous to mankind.

Courtiers fawned and poets rhapsodized. The mother forgot her long torture in the pride of her belief that she had borne a successor to the master of the world. The father's cheeks were wet with tears of joy as he stood beside the cradle of gold and gazed at the tiny hand that still would make kings tremble when he was gone and that would pass on to posterity the scepter he had won. Now he could entail Europe and humanity. France should be the baby's patrimony and all the earth his hegemony.

He must have at once the proudest crown that ever weighted an infant head. Whereupon Napoleon hailed his babe King of Rome and carried him through the arch of triumph to Notre Dame, where, with great pomp, he christened him for himself and for the boy's imperial Austrian grandfather Napoleon Francis Joseph Charles.

THE OTHER BOY.

While Napoleon had the only baby king in the world, there were several million other baby boys 100 years ago. One of them was 2 years old and a little more when Napoleon Francis Joseph Charles thrilled Europe with his birth cry. No notice had been taken of the existence of this child, however, beyond a mile or two of his birthplace. His birth did not receive even the honor of a line in any record that has been discovered. No physician was summoned to aid the mother in her labors, and the father could not record the event, since he hardly knew how to write his own name.

No neighbor took enough interest in it ever to be able in after years to recollect the coming of this boy into the world. It boded no more than another hungry mouth with which to share the crust of poverty. His eyes opened not on palace walls, but on the rough logs of a hut in the Kentucky wilderness. No crib of gold awaited him; his only cradle was his mother's arms. His sole crown was some chance rag that could be fashioned into the semblance of a cap.

Nature, however, that incorrigible democrat, had given him just as many fingers as the King of Rome wherewith to grasp anything they could lay hold of, from a rattle to a scepter.

L'AIGLON.

Pitiful as the contrast is between the births of those two boys, the contrast between their destinies is more pitiful still. Indeed, it is almost unkind to draw it.

The poor little King of Rome at 3 saw his crown dashed to pieces like a fragile toy. Marie Louise, his mother, fled with him to a cold welcome at her father's court in Vienna. His own father became to him a nameless outcast, and tutors puzzled how they might bring him up in ignorance of the empire and the glory to which he had been dedicated during his infancy. An alien name—the Duke of Reichstadt—and as he reached the years when under other fortunes he would have taken his place in the grand army as prince imperial his keepers strove to make him proud to put on the uniform of an Austrian sergeant.

The fledgling of the eagle never showed a desire to escape from his gilded cage, and although he died at 21 he lived long enough for the world to forget him.

THE HANDICAP OF ADVANTAGES.

If the world could have had eyes to see the start of the race between those two boys for fame and power 100 years ago, it would have had only a smile of pity for the son of Thomas Lincoln; its confidence and cheers would have been, as they were, all for the son of Napoleon.

Yet it was by no strange trick of fortune that Abraham Lincoln won the race. Leave out of the reckoning the early death of the King of Rome, leave out his father's downfall, leave this boy out entirely, and take any one of a hundred or a thousand heirs to great hopes who were born 100 years ago and match him against Lincoln. Lincoln beat all the kinglets and princelings as he beat the King of Rome. They were endowed with no more fingers and no more toes than he had. Every fancied advantage which was fondly conferred on them only loaded them down.

HOW TO MAKE A KING.

Napoleon himself started at nothing and whipped the heir of all ages. Yet he forgot that he could not transmit to his son the superiority that had lifted him above the sons of conquerors. As well might an athletic champion flatter himself that he could bequeath his championship.

If Napoleon was determined to raise up another Napoleon, he might have tried to rear his boy as he was reared rather than like a Bourbon. His father and mother were hunted things in the Corsican mountains until within a few weeks of his birth, when, the war being over, they returned to Ajaccio, weary and poverty stricken, but just in time for him to be born under a roof. His childhood was as free as a savage's and nearly as wild. The sailors on the beach and the herdsmen in the mountains were his favorite companions and principal instructors.

LEARNING TO RULE.

The most practical and useful monarch Europe ever had was Peter the Great. He stepped down from the throne of the Czars and went to work in disguise that he might learn how to rule.

He stepped down from the throne of the Czars and shunned princes and palaces. Laboring and living among the working people of Holland, England, and other foreign countries, he made docks and shipyards and machine shops his university. Equipped with lessons from real life, he went back to his throne and erected Russia into a nation, adding half a dozen provinces to his empire, pushing its frontier to the shores of two seas, set up a modern army and fleet, and established academies, galleries, and libraries.

Liberty is the only school for greatness, and privation and toil the only teachers. The prevalent stupidity of royalty and aristocracy is far less surprising than the genius it develops in rare instances under overwhelming disadvantages.

LINCOLN'S APPRENTICESHIP.

In the race for all the greatest prizes of life there is a good deal of fairness and equality. There is a pretty even start for the enduring honors in statecraft and war, in letters, in science, and in whatever field men contend for the noblest rewards. Fame really means to be democratic, and there is no royal road to her temple.

It is open to doubt if any king ever had as many advantages as Abraham Lincoln or was so well trained for ruling or leading a people. We hear much of his disadvantages, and many view his triumph over them as in the nature of a miracle. Looked at in another light, however, it is plainly to be seen that Lincoln was far more wisely apprenticed than any prince to the trade of governing. Thus when his great task came to him it found him trained like a thorough journeyman to lead the masses whose life he shared.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, coming from Pennsylvania I trust I am not ungracious in rising to say a word in favor of this concurrent resolution. I am reminded to-day of the scriptural injunction:

Is not the life more than meat and the body than raiment.

On the one side is the utilitarian idea, a road to Gettysburg; on the other is the esthetic, the beautiful—the appeal to memory, to gratitude, to veneration, to pay a tribute and show our appreciation of the greatness of Abraham Lincoln.

I am not opposed to the Gettysburg road. It is a splendid project. I hope it can be worked out in the future, either as a Lincoln memorial or as a direct proposal to build a national highway from the Capital to one of the greatest battle fields of the world; but I am first in favor of an appropriate mausoleum in the city of Washington.

From the earliest days it has been our policy to erect in the National Capital suitable memorials to the men whom the people delight to honor. Washington, Marshall, Lafayette, Jackson, Scott, Webster, the French and Polish patriots in the Revolution, Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, and the other great names that stand out in history because of their deeds in the Civil War. All these have been honored, but alas, nothing yet for the greatest of them all, Abraham Lincoln. Thirty-four years ago a Lincoln Memorial Association was formed and money raised, but nothing came of the movement. Now a conclusion has been reached so that the matter is presented to us in a distinct, clear, concrete form.

Who goes to Paris without a pilgrimage to the Hotel Des Invalides and with a melancholy pleasure immerses himself in the atmosphere which pervades the tomb of the great Napoleon?

What American or what lover of his race will in the coming years ever visit Washington without having first in his heart a desire to bow at the shrine of Abraham Lincoln, to read his immortal words on the proposed entablature, and thereafter highly resolve that the sacrifices of his day and generation for the uplift of the human race shall not have been in vain?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I gather from the debate that there is practical unanimity among the Members of this House in the belief that the time has now come when there ought to be a memorial of some kind erected or constructed by the American people to the memory of Abraham Lincoln. There is a division of opinion as to whether that memorial should be a utilitarian or a sentimental one. Personally I prefer the sentimental memorial. I have come to my conclusion after having torn a few leaves from the history of the past. I recall that in the city of Rome, near the ancient Forum, there stands the Arch of Titus. It is somewhat scarred and weather-beaten, for it has braved the elements since the first century of the Christian era. The buildings that surround it have crumbled into dust, but it still stands—a mute reminder of the eventful history of the Emperor Titus—he who with Vespacian built the Coliseum, which stands nearby; the marble facings and the bronze ornaments that decorated that wonderful arena have all disappeared. The shouts of triumph or dismay, as the occasion warranted, that reverberated throughout its spacious interior have faded into silence. The lizard and the bat are its sole inhabitants. It is a magnificent ruin and few even recall in whose reign it was constructed. Close by the Arch of Titus is the Arch of Constantine. It, too, is in a fair state of preservation. It stands alone near the ruins of what was once the glory of imperial Rome, the Forum. It was constructed in the early part of the fourth century. The barbarians who captured and destroyed the proud mistress of the world, imperial Rome, allowed it to remain—a mute reminder of the life of one of the foremost of the Roman Emperors. The Column of Trajan, erected in the closing years of the first century and the Column of Hadrian, erected during the same period, still rear their lofty tops toward the blue of heaven, while the buildings that surrounded them at the time of their construction have almost entirely disappeared from the ken of man. If it were not for these few memorials of pure sentiment that have withstood the ravages of time, the four Emperors whose lives and memories they commemorate would probably have been forgotten, even as the lives and memories of so many of the Emperors of Rome have become obliterated.

Some of the Members of this House seem to favor a great road to connect our Capital with the battlefield at Gettysburg. In advocacy of their plan they point to the Appian Way and contend that that road conferred immortality upon its builder. But they do not tell the Members of this House that the Appian Way was built entirely by slave labor; they do not tell the Members of the House that during the Dark Ages, when the barbarians of northern Europe ravaged the Campagna and broke through the walls of the Eternal City itself, they destroyed the famous thoroughfare. It was buried among the ruins of the tombs and mausoleums that lined it on either side. During the Middle Ages the Appian Way was almost entirely lost to the sight of man. It remained buried until the year 1850, when Pope Pius IX ordered Canina, one of the leading archeologists of his period, to excavate the ruins and the débris that covered it, and restore it for the benefit of the Italian people. Although the road originally ran to Capua and thence to Brundusium, the modern city of Brindisi, a distance of several hundred miles, the restoration of Canina proceeded only 6 or 8 miles beyond the tomb of Caecilia Metella, one of the few ruins that faced the ancient roadway at the dawn of the renaissance. I understand that even to-day it is not a highway beyond its tenth mile.

While no one can look into the future, and while we all hope that this Republic may endure forever, it is not outside of the range of possibility that any road that might be built between Washington and Gettysburg may some day meet the fate of the Appian Way.

We have had one experience in road building in this country. The Cumberland Road, known as "the great National Pike," was begun in 1806 and finished in 1840. How many of our countrymen know anything about it in this day and generation? And yet it was the subject of debate upon this floor time and again during that period. With the advent of the railroads it fell into disuse. For 16 years after its completion it was controlled by the Federal Government, but in 1856 it was relegated to the various States through which it passed. It is to-day little more than a memory.

To refer to one or two other monuments that commemorate the lives of those in whose honor they were erected, I need simply mention the Pyramid of Cheops, which has withstood the decay of time and the attacks of the elements for about 4,000 years. The villages and the towns that surrounded it have been effaced from the face of the earth. Even the splendid civilization of the Egyptians is to-day largely a matter of conjecture, but that wonderful pile stands in all its majesty and grandeur to remind those of our era that once upon a time there existed in Egypt, in the very heyday of the civilization of that historic land, a monarch by the name of Cheops or Khufu. At Kamakura, in Japan, stands a massive bronze monument of the Buddha, or Gautama, who lived in India 2,500 years ago. It has stood for generations. It has come down to us practically intact and unimpaired. And so I might go on recalling memorials of sentiment that have been erected to commemorate the world's heroes, and that still endure, while the utilitarian institutions which surrounded them have crumbled into shapeless ruins.

I believe that the so-called Greek temple in Potomac Park would stand for centuries as an inspiration to the youth of our land. When the generations yet unborn will behold it they will recall the fact that the martyred President sprung from the loins of an humble farmer and frontiersman; that he rose to the highest office within the gift of a mighty and free people; that he illustrates the wonderful possibilities of American citizenship; that he preserved the American Union; that his clear judgment and patriotic purposes brought order out of chaos; and that a grateful and reunited country, desiring to honor his memory, has erected this magnificent memorial to Abraham Lincoln in token of the love, the gratitude, and the veneration with which its citizens regard one of the greatest of all mankind.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the same privilege.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen may extend their remarks in the RECORD within five legislative days upon this bill now pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen may extend their remarks for five legislative days upon this bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does that include those who have not spoken?

The SPEAKER. It includes every Member in the House.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is now nearly half a century since the Civil War closed and Abraham Lincoln passed beyond. There has been a lapse of time which ought to permit us to survey the situation with little bias and little passion. I have put the Civil War behind me, a great conflict which was probably inevitable. There were patriots on both sides, gallant men in opposition, but the question of the Union was settled with the end of the war, and no one now would reopen the controverted question so bitterly contested before and during that war. I think we can well afford to do that which shows that the country is again a reunited country, with the passions of war passed by, if not forgotten. I would erect a memorial to Abraham Lincoln on the farther side of the Washington Monument, just this side of the Potomac River, across the river from the home of Robert E. Lee and the burial place of both Union and Confederate soldiers, and then I would erect a memorial bridge across that Potomac River, joining the then Confederate States with the Union, aye, Mr. Speaker, joining the memory of Abraham Lincoln with the memories and respect for Lee. Aye, Mr. Speaker, I would go further. In the course of years not far distant I would construct a roadway from Washington to Mount Vernon, from Mount Vernon to Richmond, and at the other end of that roadway have the Government of the United States construct a memorial to Jefferson Davis, the President of the Confederate States. [Applause.]

When we have done that we have shown to the world that the hearts of all Americans beat in the present as in the past with respect and love for their leaders on both sides. We can afford to forget the animosities and the passions in the peace that passeth all understanding. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the amendments which have been offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. This resolution is a resolution providing:

> That the plan, design, and location for a Lincoln memorial, determined upon and recommended to Congress December 4, 1912, by the commission created by the act—
>
> Referred to in the resolution—
> be, and the same are hereby, approved.

The act referred to in the resolution is an act approved February 9, 1911, which the Speaker will find in Thirty-sixth Statutes at Large, page 898. That was passed in the last Congress. That act provides that the gentlemen named in the act are created a commission to secure and determine upon a location, plan, and design for a monument or memorial in the city of Washington, D. C., to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, subject to the approval of Congress. Section 3 of the act provides—

> That the construction of the monument or memorial herein and hereby authorized shall be upon such site as shall be determined by the commission herein created and approved by Congress.

The resolution pending before the House is simply a resolution to approve the location, the plan, and the design on the report of the commission which has been submitted to Congress in conformity with the act. It is not a resolution to amend the original act; it does not propose to amend the original act at all, but it is simply a resolution in accordance with the provisions of the original act to approve the plans which have been submitted by the commission.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. This is a joint resolution which has been passed and approved and has the force and effect of law?

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then does the gentleman not agree that we can repeal this entire law or this joint resolution or amend it in any way?

Mr. MANN. I am arguing now that you can not.

Mr. BARTLETT. Can not amend it or repeal it?

Mr. MANN. It is perfectly patent under the proposition that to repeal it is not germane to the resolution.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does not the gentleman from Illinois contend that this act could not be amended or repealed?

Mr. MANN. Certainly not. It would be in order to repeal or to pass an act or bill repealing the original act or amending the original act, but that is not the resolution pending before the House. It is not proposed by the resolution to affect the original act at all. There is not to be a line of the original act changed by this resolution. This resolution is in accordance with the existing provisions of the original act, providing for the approval by Congress of the plans recommended by the commission.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. We could approve these plans as well by an act as we could by a joint resolution?

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BARTLETT. There is no difference in an act or a joint resolution?

Mr. MANN. Not the slightest, in my opinion.

Mr. BARTLETT. And whatever you could do on a bill pending for this purpose you could do on a joint resolution?

Mr. MANN. I think so.

Now, the Speaker recently held that where a bill was pending to amend a section of the judiciary title, I believe, it was not in order to amend another section of that title, nor in order, by way of amendment, to introduce any new subject matter not contemplated in the bill itself, because not germane to the provisions of the bill.

And even if in this case there were a bill pending to change the name of one of the commissioners I do not think it would be in order, as germane to that bill, to amend the other provisions of the act. But the joint resolution pending now is not a resolution to amend the original act at all. It is a resolution to carry into effect the provisions of the act as they stand in the law, providing that Congress shall approve these plans before the construction commences.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard in opposition to the point of order.

Mr. Speaker, the view taken by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would so narrow the issue and so narrow the power of Congress in this respect that there would be nothing left for Congress to do under any form of resolution that could be introduced but to approve or disapprove the specific design or plan for a memorial.

The original act by which this commission was created is entitled "An act to provide a commission to secure plans and designs for a monument or memorial to the memory of Abraham Lincoln." That title is broad enough to include not only a monument, such as is here reported upon, but any other form of memorial. But it is manifest by the line of argument adopted by the gentleman from Illinois that he would limit it to a monument, and there could be no other form of memorial.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can dismiss that part of it from his mind at once, because the Chair thinks it is broad enough to cover any kind of a building that is intended to perpetuate the name of Lincoln. The Chair will ask the gentleman this question: What does the gentleman think about the limitation of that statute as to the place where this memorial is to be built?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, that is no more a necessary feature of this statute than the name of any of the commissioners or any of the other details of the original enactment. Congress intended to—and I believe the Speaker will agree that it did—reserve to itself the final word upon what this memorial should be. The memorial commission actually investigated—so they claim by their report—the Lincoln highway. They actually investigated other forms of memorials. But it is clearly within the power of Congress, having reserved to itself the right to approve or disapprove the findings of the commission created by Congress, to disapprove the findings of the commission and refer the matter to the commission with instructions to report upon some other form of memorial. Otherwise the power of approval reserved would be of no value to Congress.

Now, these gentlemen here have spoken about a bridge. Some of them have spoken about an arch. Some of them have spoken about an industrial school. The gentleman from Kentucky made a very eloquent speech about a road to Richmond. All of these projects seem to have been clearly in the minds of Members of Congress as possible and permissible under some form of memorial to Abraham Lincoln, as designated in the title of that act.

This resolution that I offer simply asks this commission to report on the first Monday in December, 1913, as Congress has the right to ask it to report, upon a memorial highway from Washington to the battle field of Gettysburg or any other appropriate memorial road, bridge, institution, or structure. That language is broad enough to include every proposition that has been debated before the House to-day.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. What does the gentleman say in connection with his statement that this act is broad enough to include his project from here to Gettysburg battle field, when in the language of the act creating this commission these words are used:

> To secure and determine upon a location, plans, and design for a monument or memorial in the city of Washington, D. C., to the memory of Abraham Lincoln.

It is not outside; it is not to Gettysburg, but it is in the city of Washington, the District of Columbia.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the point I was trying to make. The design and purpose of that original law and of this resolution, which rests only upon that original law, was to find an appropriate memorial to Abraham Lincoln. The other matter was a matter of detail. Undoubtedly that must be one way in one law and another way in another law without changing the fundamental, underlying purpose of the law, which purpose was the establishment of a memorial to Abraham Lincoln; and any form of resolution is germane which is germane to that underlying proposition, without regard to details.

Suppose, instead of being "the District of Columbia," the detail had been that it should be on a certain square in the District of Columbia, or that it should be in a certain part of the District of Columbia, or some other incidental detail. Those matters are purely directory in many laws, but in this one more especially, because it does not enter at all into the fundamental purpose, which is to secure a memorial to Lincoln that Congress deems to be appropriate. If Congress deems that the memorial selected is not appropriate, it must have reserved to itself some vital power—not an empty power over the question—when it finally comes before Congress in the form of a report of the commission.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. And yet in your resolution the District of Columbia is included.

Mr. BORLAND. Under the resolution I offer the commission could bring in any other memorial in the District of Columbia, even this Greek temple, for they are not limited to any particular structure. They are entitled to report upon any other Greek temple or upon an arch or any other memorial.

Now, what is the result of the reasoning of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]? Congress must vote down this proposition unless it is willing to accept, without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t," the report of the Fine Arts Commission and the Lincoln Memorial Commission. If every Member of Congress is not agreed that that is the best form of memorial for Lincoln, there is no parliamentary alternative, according to this argument, except to vote it down. What is the result of that? The commission having reported has no more vitality. The gentleman says we can not extend the life of it; we can not enlarge its powers; we can not change the directions we gave to it. If a line of argument so narrow is followed, then we have no power except to vote it down, thereby putting an end forever to the commission and destroying the very purpose that Congress had, the fundamental purpose of really securing a memorial for Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman hardly intended to say that my contention was that Congress could not change the provisions about the memorial. That is not the question now pending before the Speaker. The question is whether an amendment is germane to the pending proposition. Congress has it within its power to repeal the law providing for the Lincoln Memorial Commission or to amend the law providing for the Lincoln Memorial Commission or to provide other commissions or to do what it pleases about it; but the question here is whether a proposed amendment is germane to a resolution simply approving something as contemplated by law.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The pending resolution is very simple. It is simply to approve certain findings of that commission, that one proposition and nothing else.

The present occupant of the Chair has ruled more than once, or at least he ruled once and proposes to stick to it, that where a law contains several sections and some gentleman brings in a bill to amend one section of that law only, then the House can not wander around and undertake in that bill to amend other sections of that law, because there must be an end and a limit to all things. The statute provides that the Lincoln monument or memorial shall be "in the District of Columbia." That settles that part of it. I do not believe that under that statute you can go outside the District of Columbia. I do not believe that a fair, careful reading of this resolution will permit any amendment providing for passing on another memorial in the city of Washington or out of it.

There are various ways of defeating this proposition. The first step, if the House desires to take it, is to vote this resolution down. Any step might be taken after that. There are two ways of getting rid entirely of this limitation as to the District of Columbia. One of them is by a bill amending the statute creating the commission, and another by a joint resolution, which is tantamount to a bill, for the same purpose. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, does that apply to the amendment that I introduced?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated a part of the ruling does not apply to the proposition offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to call attention to the fact that my amendment applies to the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that. The last part of the ruling applies to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. The language of this resolution is as simple as it can be, and an amendment that undertakes to amend this resolution by authorizing the erection of another memorial would not be germane. If the House does not want this memorial, it can vote this joint resolution down.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOOHER. Does that apply to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee? His amendment is to disapprove and refer the matter back to the commission.

The SPEAKER. All of these amendments are exactly alike in substance except the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], which contains another proposition also.

Mr. BOOHER. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee was for a memorial arch within the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that. The Chair says that under this resolution no amendment establishing another memorial to Lincoln, either in the District of Columbia or out of it, is germane to the pending resolution.

Mr. BOOHER. Would not an amendment be in order disapproving the findings of that commission and referring the matter back to them without designating what they shall do?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that when the proper times comes any gentleman in the House can move to recommit the resolution, and if that motion carries that ends it for the time being. But nothing is permissible in a motion to recommit that is not permissible by way of amendment.

Mr. BOOHER. That is what I understood the rule to be, and I am inquiring whether an amendment disapproving the report and referring it back to the commission would be in order.

The SPEAKER. A motion to recommit and referring it back would undoubtedly be in order.

Mr. BORLAND rose.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and pending amendments, and I wish to say to a number of gentlemen to whom I have promised time that I am treating them as I have treated myself. I have made no speech, because I felt it important that others could make the speeches.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] was on his feet addressing the Chair before the gentleman from Illinois made his motion. What is it the gentleman from Missouri rose for?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit an amendment, as follows: That the word "approved" in the resolution be stricken out, and in lieu thereof the words "disapproved; and the matter referred to the commission for further report upon the proposed memorial to Abraham Lincoln" be inserted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, to that I make a point of order.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER. Has debate been closed by action of the House?

The SPEAKER. Debate has not been closed. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserved the point of order against each one of these amendments as they were offered.

Mr. COOPER. That does not affect the debate on the main question?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to make a statement? During the debate in my absence to-day the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] told the House that yesterday I made a mistake in reporting what was written to me by Col. Watrous as to the favorable attitude of the Grand Army of the Republic toward the proposed memorial to Lincoln in this city. He said that he had with him a copy of the resolution adopted at the meeting of the Grand Army of the Republic in Los Angeles last September, which resolution, he said, was against the memorial.

On returning to the Chamber and learning of this statement of the gentleman from Ohio I immediately went to the telegraph office and wired to Col. Watrous in Milwaukee, who, as I said yesterday, was in the Battle of Gettysburg and at one time commander of the Grand Army of the Republic. I told him of the contradiction that the gentleman from Ohio, Gen. SHERWOOD, had made to my remarks, and asked him to wire me a reply at once. I have his reply, received a few moments ago. It is dated Milwaukee, January 20, 1913, and is addressed to me. It says:

> Vote unanimous against road and for memorial in Washington.
> J. A. WATROUS.

Then my friend from Illinois, Mr. EVANS, and my friend from Illinois, Mr. MANN, told me that a soldier on the floor of the House, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. THISTLEWOOD, had a certified copy of the record of the proceedings of the Grand Army of the Republic at their meeting in Los Angeles last September. That soldier handed it to me, and with the permission of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] I will occupy time enough to read the resolution in question.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. It is as follows:

> Comrade Taylor, of Illinois, read the following report:
> "Your committee on report of the committee on Lincoln way approves the report of the committee and recommends the indorsement by this encampment of the Cullom bill for the Lincoln Memorial Commission to erect a monument, to be located on the banks of the Potomac.
>
> "WILLIAM C. ALBERGER,
> "CHARLES H. TAYLOR,
> "ALBERT A. NILES,
> "Committee."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to know how the gentleman from Wisconsin obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] yielded him the time.

Mr. BORLAND. But the gentleman from Illinois did not have the floor. I had the floor to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin rose and obtained the floor by asking to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] had raised the point of order to my amendment.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] yielded the gentleman from Wisconsin time enough to read the telegram.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not see how he could do that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the gentleman from Missouri object to the telegram being read?

Mr. BORLAND. I object to his taking the floor in that manner. Other gentlemen want the floor and can not get it.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the situation, the gentleman from Illinois was recognized and proceeded to and did move the previous question on the resolution to final passage.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. CANNON. I am not mistaken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state exactly what happened. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] rose and moved the previous question, but prior to that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] had addressed the Chair. The Chair supposed he wanted to make a parliamentary inquiry, and not desiring to cut off any gentleman from the privilege of making a parliamentary inquiry, he asked the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] to withhold his motion until the Chair could ask what the gentleman from Missouri desired. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] had moved the previous question.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I obtained the floor to offer an amendment and did so, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserved the point of order against the amendment. It was on that situation that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] rose and asked leave to make a parliamentary inquiry, or some sort of an inquiry. Then when he had proceeded for some time he asked for time from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS], who had no time and who had not the control of the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair believed at that time that that was the shortest way out.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I have only to add that that report was adopted. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND and Mr. EVANS rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I have submitted an amendment here against which a point of order has been made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Before discussing that point of order I should like to ask the gentleman to withhold his point of order until I may yield a few minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD], who, in fairness, would like to be heard for a few moments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not yield time on a point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, while I did say I made the point of order on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], that amendment was never offered, was never reported from the Clerk's desk, where it is necessary it should be. I have no objection to the gentleman having an opportunity to offer it.

Mr. BORLAND. I offered it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the situation, and I watched it closely, is that the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague, Mr. EVANS, has the floor. He moved the previous question, and then, in the nature of unanimous consent, without his losing the floor, we have had what followed. I think he is entitled to the floor now and has not yielded the floor, as I understand it. I have no objection if the gentleman from Illinois will yield for unanimous consent to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] having a minute, not to interfere with my colleague's right to the floor.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. GARNER. I rise for a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that the Chair recognized the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] when he was standing on his feet for the purpose of offering an amendment. In the meantime the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] rose before the amendment was offered and the Chair recognized him, and he moved the previous question. Since that time there have been several things done in the way of conversation and parliamentary inquiries, but I submit to the Chair that the Chair had recognized the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] before he recognized the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. No; no.

Mr. GARNER. I appeal to the record of the notes that the Chair had recognized the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], and the gentleman from Missouri was about offering his amendment; then the Chair recognized the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS], and he moved the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Here is the situation: The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] moved the previous question. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] had been trying to attract the attention of the Chair when he made the ruling on these amendments, and the Chair supposed that he was going to ask a parliamentary inquiry or appeal from the decision of the Chair; but he did neither, and his amendment was never offered.

Mr. GARNER. Well, the parliamentary situation is simply this: If the Chair desired to recognize the gentleman from Missouri for the purpose of offering an amendment, he having been standing on his feet for that purpose, he could have done so, but if he preferred to recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] to move the previous question he can do that.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I would like to refresh the Chair's memory for a moment. When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] rose to move the previous question the Chair said of his own motion——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for me to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri be entitled to offer the amendment which he suggested, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] to be permitted to address the House for two minutes, and at the end of that time the previous question be considered as ordered on the resolution and amendment thereto to final passage?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] shall be permitted to offer his amendment, and that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] shall have two minutes, and at the end of which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he means the previous question shall be considered as ordered or considered as offered?

Mr. MANN. As ordered.

Mr. BORLAND. Then I will have to object, because I can not——

Mr. CANNON. Regular order!

Mr. BORLAND (continuing). I can not consent to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EVANS] moves the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate resolution.

The Senate resolution was read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the Senate resolution.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BOOHER. To move to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had already recognized the other gentleman from Missouri to make a motion to recommit.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee on the Library.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit the resolution to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question on that motion.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit this resolution to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the yeas are 31, the nays are 153, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question that there is no quorum present

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-nine Members are present—a quorum.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I did not understand the Chair to announce whether or not there was a quorum. I rise for the purpose of asking the presence of the enrolled bill before final passage.

Mr. FOSTER. I make the point of order that it is too late.

Mr. MANN. We had the third reading.

The SPEAKER. The request comes too late.

EXPENSES OF INAUGURAL CEREMONIES.

Mr. FITZGERALD, from the Committee on Appropriations, by unanimous consent, reported back Senate joint resolution 157, to enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay the necessary expenses of the inaugural ceremonies of the President of the United States on March 4, 1913, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

THE LINCOLN MEMORIAL.

The SPEAKER. The question is on recommitting Senate joint resolution 158.

Mr. MANN. We had the vote on the motion to recommit, and declined to grant the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair's recollection about this is that immediately after the Chair announced that the vote was on the motion to recommit, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. And then the Speaker went through the counting process to find out whether the yeas and nays would be ordered, and, finally, whether there was a quorum present. The Chair does not believe he can be mistaken about that recollection. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. The noes have it.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The House has just refused the yeas and nays on this proposition.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall this resolution pass?

The question was taken, and the Senate joint resolution was passed.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 23351) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1169) thereon.

Mr. WORKS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 7875) to exempt from cancellation certain desert-land entries in the Chuckawalla Valley and Palo Verde Mesa, Riverside County, Cal., reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1170) thereon.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 24365) providing for the taking over by the United States Government of the Confederate cemetery at Little Rock, Ark., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1171) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 6766) providing for the taking over by the United States Government of the Confederate cemetery at Little Rock, Ark., reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 4549) to place the name of Sergt. Herman C. Funk upon the officers' retired list, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1172) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CULBERSON:

A bill (S. 8315) granting permission to Ella S. Gilliland, and Clara E. Gilliland, joined by her husband, W. H. Gilliland, to institute suit against the United States of America in the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Texas for the partition and adjustment of the rights and titles claimed by them in certain lands situated in said eastern district of Texas; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SMITH of Maryland:

A bill (S. 8316) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth McLaughlin; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KERN:

A bill (S. 8317) for the relief of John M. Butler (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 8318) granting an increase of pension to Thomas White (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 8319) granting an increase of pension to Joel A. Griffin (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SANDERS:

A bill (S. 8320) granting an increase of pension to Matilda I. Nason; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GRONNA:

A bill (S. 8321) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 8322) granting a pension to Charles O. Farnsworth (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 8323) for the relief of F. W. Tyler; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 8324) to appoint James W. Keen as master's mate in the Revenue-Cutter Service, and to place him as such upon the retired list; to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 8325) granting an increase of pension to Carrie A. Miller; and

A bill (S. 8326) granting a pension to Jesse F. Cochran, alias Franklin Cochran; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH of Arizona:

A bill (S. 8327) for the relief of G. O. Nolan; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey (for Mr. BRIGGS):

A bill (S. 8328) to place Peter Vredenburgh, late first lieutenant of Infantry, United States Army, on the retired list of the Army; and

A bill (S. 8329) for the relief of Second Lieut. John F. Brown, Philippine Scouts, United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BRADLEY:

A bill (S. 8330) granting an increase of pension to Leander Ledford (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 8331) granting a pension to Josephina Soleau (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 8332) to increase the limit of cost of the public building at Piqua, Ohio; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. WORKS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,250,000 for necessary improvements on the Colorado River to protect the lands and property of Imperial Valley, Cal., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $22,067 for the maintenance of the improvement of San Diego Harbor, Cal., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment providing for a survey of Berkeley Harbor with a view to the development and completion of the Berkeley inner harbor, California, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LODGE (for Mr. CRANE) submitted an amendment providing for a survey of Marion Harbor, Mass., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF PILOTAGE.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 7629) to provide for the further Federal regulation of pilotage, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (H. R. 18787) relating to the limitation of the hours of daily services of laborers and mechanics employed upon a public work of the United States and of the District of Columbia, and of all persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States and of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BORAH. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BORAH, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. SHIVELY conferees on the part of the Senate.

ADDRESS OF SENATOR HEISKELL.

Mr. HEISKELL. Mr. President, if you should be surprised that I who have so lately become a Member of this body should now arise to say farewell, please remember that there are circumstances over which I have no control. Certain Senators were kind enough to invite, advise, and induce me to make my leave-taking the occasion for some remarks to the Senate. I am glad to see that we have a quorum of the Senate present, but I must observe that of those Senators who invited, advised, and induced me to speak there is not a quorum present. I have the news from Arkansas, where the legislature is in session. My successor, whom I can warrant to you as a good and worthy man, has been elected, and even now he is bearing down upon me, armed with a commission which is to serve as a writ of dispossession against the present occupant of this seat. Within a few weeks, after March 4, he in his turn will be succeeded by another Senator. But you know the saying is the third time the charm, and this third Senator will stay with you for the full term of six years. There is senatorial glory enough to go around—if you keep it moving fast enough. I have foreseen what has now happened and thus you will be able to understand why I have, since coming here, been making an exhaustive and painstaking investigation to find what are the rights, privileges, prerogatives, and immunities that may be enjoyed by a man who is a former Member of the United States Senate.

After a service in this body of 22 days I am going home and spend the remaining years of my life in writing my "reminiscences of the Senate." When I came here I was not even acquainted with the geography of the Capitol and its grounds, and I had some difficulty in finding my way into the Senate, but the Arkansas Legislature has now shown me the way out. I had equal difficulty with respect to the Senate Office Building, but I finally located my quarters in a committee room over whose door is a legend that I at first hastily read as "Mississippi River and its tribulations," for I knew that the tribulations of the Mississippi River are both grievous and multitudinous.

I must make acknowledgment that my stay here has been made pleasant, and things generally have been made easy for me by that historic courtesy that guides and sweetens the proceedings of this body. I have found pleasure in doing my part as best I could in this courtesy while a Member here, but as I am editor of a newspaper I am somewhat perturbed at the thought that an obligation to observe the highest courtesy toward the Senate may rest upon me for the rest of my life. And if when other editors are thundering against the Senate I must sit silent in my sanctum, I shall indeed suffer partial paralysis of my editorial functions.

I came by the Senatorship by the easy way of appointment by the governor. I did not have to go through the storm and stress or, I might even say, the rough and tumble of a State-wide, popular primary, which, under normal conditions, is the arbiter of political fate in Arkansas. And I can assure Senators who have never had that experience that when a man gets a Senatorship as a result of a popular primary he is fairly entitled to enjoy to the fullest all its honors and emoluments. We have indeed in the popular primary States a government of the people, and I affirm my faith in that government, even though there are some persons in these States who are apprehensive at what may befall us from the votes of those electors, who are dubbed with the uncouth terms of "red neck" and "hillbilly." And what is a hillbilly? He is one of thousands and thousands of white men, poor in the goods of this world, the very foundation course of the structure of human society, who work at the trades of the countryside or cultivate small farms in the sweat of their own brows, whose greatest interests in this world are home, family, school, church, and their country. If these men are sometimes misled, the fault is not so much with them as with him who perverts his talents and abuses his powers to play upon their honest hearts and open minds. It is natural that they should be moved and influenced by one who goes among them dressed, maybe, somewhat in their own garb, even though he may have assumed that dress for the purpose of that express excursion, who can talk to them in their own words and phrases, who can comfort them in their troubles and rejoice with them in their simple joys, who can, actually or in effect, put his arm around them and make them feel that he is their friend and their defense, for the inequalities of social and economic conditions always yearn for a voice to cry their protest. As it was in Greece and Rome, so it is with us to-day. He who has consummate skill to put himself in the place of a champion of the people is not merely a well-known and popular man; he becomes a sentiment, a belief, a creed, and a conviction. But if anyone fears that these masses of men may lay violent hands upon the historic fabric of our institutions, let him remember that the day may come when their true American bone and fiber will make them a fortress and a stronghold for all those things this Nation holds most dear.

Mr. President, one of the great figures in the history of the Senate said, in speaking of his State:

> I shall enter on no encomium upon Massachusetts. She needs none. There she is. Behold her and judge for yourselves.

And I may say that my State of Arkansas needs no encomium. She needs only to be seen and to be known. For it has been the singular misfortune of Arkansas to be misused, misadvertised, misunderstood, and misinterpreted. Because we have areas of lowlands along with our highlands, our hills, and our mountains, some persons who are unacquainted with the State are accustomed to speak of it as a place of swamps.

For the most part these lowlands are not swamps at all. They are covered with towns and plantations, or are lands that can be reclaimed for farms and homes with the simplest works of drainage, and are being so reclaimed by local enterprise. But "swamp" is a ready and an easy word, which gratifies the human appetite for a touch of derogation, and is often chosen by the tongue in preference to more accurate, if less satisfying, terms of description. In my own State we have a name for a particular type of political partisan who inhabits the lowlands and is noted for the great interest he takes in public affairs. He is called a "Swamp Democrat." These lowlands lie generally in eastern Arkansas, a region that was in part inundated by the last great flood in the Mississippi. A flood is a bad visitation. But eastern Arkansas is the daughter of the Father of Waters. For century after century he has drawn on the East, the North, and the West for the treasures of their soil and laid them at her feet. And when mankind came to claim this daughter of the river he found her dowered with wealth far greater than the marriage portions of all the princesses of the earth. Now that eastern Arkansas has been wooed and won by mankind, she has built bulwarks against the Mississippi, but sometimes he breaks in and leaves muddy tracks all over the place. Thus we are in need of works of reclamation, for flood protection and drainage, and for channel improvement also. It is a saying in our State that Arkansas has more miles of navigable rivers than any other State in the Union, and, I regret to add, perhaps as few miles of navigated rivers.

The Nation might well turn its eyes to this undeveloped empire. You have heard the fearsome formula of the political economist about the pressure of population on the means of subsistence. But in Arkansas so many crops may be raised in the same year on the same ground, and so bountiful is the earth that the trouble is rather the pressure of the means of subsistence upon the population.

Rich in all the things that make a State both strong and great and bring it the most substantial and enduring prosperity, Arkansas may well rest content in the sure and certain knowledge that she must come into her own at last. She has suffered undeservedly from the libels of penny-a-liners, who would be shamed if they could know the excellence of the Commonwealth and its people, and from some who have managed to possess themselves of her voice and utterance and appropriated them to the forwarding of their own personal or political fortunes. Arkansas needs nothing more than to be known for what she truly is. And Arkansas asks nothing more than that her own and veritable voice, the voice of an enlightened, progressive, God-fearing, and God-serving people, may be heard before the Nation and the world.

IMMIGRATION OF ALIENS.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to give notice that immediately after the morning business to-morrow, assuming that the unanimous-consent agreement in reference to the joint resolution as to presidential term will then have been exhausted, I shall call up the conference report on the immigration bill, which has passed the other House this morning without a roll call.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the unanimous-consent agreement in reference to the special order for to-day.

The Secretary read as follows:

> It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Thursday, January 30, 1913, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 78) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and before adjournment on that legislative day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to suggest that if this amendment is to go into the Constitution of the United States we should not insert in that great instrument a split infinitive; and so, on page 2, in line 9, I suggest that the language should read: "Eligible again to hold the office by election."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that change has already been made; it was an error in the report.

Mr. LODGE. I am glad to hear that that has already been done.

Mr. CUMMINS. It was done some two or three months ago.

Mr. LODGE. But it has not been done on the copies that are furnished to us; it has been done without the knowledge of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. The joint resolution has been printed as it has in fact been reported.

Mr. LODGE. I had nothing before me except the print which we find on our desks. I did not know the change to which the Senator from Iowa refers had been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment heretofore proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 6, of the proposed amendment of the committee, before the word "years," it is proposed to strike out the word "six" and insert "four," so that, if amended, the amendment will read:

> The term of the office of President shall be four years.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, do I understand that what has just been stated is the pending question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the pending question.

Mr. LODGE. What is this that is presented to us? Is it the report of the committee amendment that has just been read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is an amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to the amendment of the committee to the joint resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I understand. I should like to ask the Secretary to read the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on the Judiciary reported the joint resolution with an amendment to strike out, beginning on page 1, line 10, as follows:

> The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of six years and shall be ineligible to a second term, and, together with the Vice President, who shall hold for a like term, and shall also be ineligible to a second term, be elected as follows:

And in lieu thereof to insert:

> The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of President shall be six years; and no person who has held the office by election, or discharged its powers or duties, or acted as President under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof shall be eligible to again hold the office by election.
> The President, together with a Vice President chosen for the same term, shall be elected as follows.

Mr. LODGE. I am glad to find that the error to which I referred has been corrected in the official copy of the joint resolution. I was misled by the only copy which was in my possession.

Mr. President, I do not propose to consume the time of the Senate in discussing this proposed amendment to the Constitution, upon which I suppose the minds of Senators are made up, nor do I think it is necessary to enter upon any protracted debate upon it. I desire merely to state my own reasons for opposing it.

I am not in favor of this change in the Constitution. The chief argument which is offered for the passage of this joint resolution, limiting the President to one term, is that if he has no hope of reelection he will then devote himself exclusively to policies for the benefit of the country and to the work of the country, and that he will not use the patronage of his great office to promote his own renomination and reelection.

I do not myself believe, Mr. President, that patronage is very helpful in electing or reelecting anyone to office. On the contrary, I believe that as a rule it is positively harmful. Instances of the defeat either for nomination or for election are very frequent in our history of a President having all the patronage in his possession. The use of patronage, of which complaint is made, is in reality chiefly with reference to its influence upon Congress. That the power of appointment has an influence upon Congress is, I think, undoubted, human nature being constructed as it is, but I can not see that limiting the President to one term will alter the effect of the patronage on Congress, if it has an effect. A President limited to one term, so far as he is personally concerned, is at least anxious that the policies to which he is committed and which he desires should be carried into execution.

The patronage, if used at all, would be just as much used for that purpose as to promote his own reelection, and even more constantly. You will not get rid of the effect of patronage or the force of the power of appointment until you are rid of human nature in the Congress of the United States. Therefore, Mr. President, it does not seem to me that in that direction the argument in regard to patronage has very great weight.

As to the point of patronage not being used to promote his own renomination or reelection, if a President is debarred from using the power of his great office to secure his own renomination or his own reelection, surely he will be desirous to have a successor who shall be in sympathy with his views, who will be willing to carry out the policies which he has been unable to complete; he will desire that his own party shall remain in power; for a President without a party and without party principles would not be a desirable President. Therefore, Mr. President, it does not seem to me that we really gain anything in that direction, and, although superficially the argument resting on the case of the presidential power appears to have much weight, it seems to me in its essence to have very little.

There is another reason which we hear spoken of, but which I need not dwell upon, namely, that a provision of this kind in the Constitution of the United States will be a defense against Cæsarism, against a permanent President or dictator. Mr. President, the protection of the country against Cæsarism or a dictatorship or a perpetual President rests in the character of the American people. No paper provision can protect us against that. If we should reach the point where the people were ready to have a perpetual President or dictator, no constitutional provision would stand in the way of a revolution of that character in our system of government, if the people had sunk to that point. When the people are ready to fall into the hands of an imperial despot or a perpetual dictator or President, paper barriers will not prevent the calamity.

But the all-sufficient reasons against the adoption of the proposed amendment to my mind are two. The first one applies to the proposition of the committee; it does not apply to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. Under our system we have divided the three branches of government—the legislative, the judicial, and the executive—and have made them coordinate and independent. Our system is not like that of England, which has been adopted very largely throughout the Continent of Europe. That system is to have the executive and the legislative power in the same hands. The executive and legislative powers of England are in reality, whatever the forms may be, vested in a committee of the House of Commons. Under that system when at an election the party control changes, the executive and the legislative change together, and they both are in harmony; but under our system that frequently is not the case. At this moment we have a President belonging to one party and the House of Representatives controlled by another. I have in my own not very long experience seen that same situation occur more than once. It happened in the last two years of President Harrison's administration; it happened in the last two years of President Cleveland's administration, and it happened frequently before that. I do not think the situation which it produces is a desirable one. I believe that the conduct of the business of the Government should be in the hands of the party which has received authority from the people to conduct the Government.

I am not prepared to say that we should give up our system of the separation of the departments on that account; but no system is perfect. It is a necessary defect in the system which divides and makes independent the three branches of government. It does not seem to me desirable to enhance the evils of that situation by making it possible to have a President and a Congress or a President and one House of Congress of different political parties last for four years instead of for two. It is a false position and an unnatural situation, one which is not consonant with our system of government. It arrests the work of carrying out the will of the people as expressed at the polls. To a certain extent it is unavoidable. As I have said, under our system it must occur from time to time, but it is now limited by the limitation of the presidential term. Under the six-year term, I think that that defect of the system, if you choose to call it such—and it is a defect, as it seems to me—would be enhanced and not diminished.

Finally, Mr. President, I think it is very dangerous to declare constitutionally that a man who has once been President of the United States shall never be President again.

I have opposed elsewhere—not here, because the question has not been raised here—but I have opposed in public discussion to the best of my ability the compulsory initiative and referendum, because I believe it means the destruction of representative government and because I believe its tendency would be to establish a method of legislation which is in its nature impossible. I know from my own experience with reference to constitutional amendments in my own State on which we are called upon to vote by "yes" or "no," at an election, that I am not capable of legislating intelligently in that way, and I do not think that others are. I believe that this scheme would force the people to legislate by a method which no people on earth can carry out effectively and intelligently. I need not enter into the details, and I do not mean to argue that question here; but it is impossible, to my mind, to have intelligent legislation by answering at the ballot box with a categorical "yes" or "no" on a measure which may include many sections and where there is no opportunity for amendment or debate. I believe myself that the system of compulsory initiative and referendum tends and is intended to throw power into the hands of comparatively small and well-organized minorities and to take it away from the great body of the people, although I know that the cry for the initiative and referendum is made in the name of the people.

Now, Mr. President, we are asked to take from the people by this proposed constitutional amendment the decision of a question which they are preeminently capable of settling. There is no question whatever that the voters of this country are able to say whether they think a certain man who has served as President ought again to be President; and it seems to me we are simply taking from the people by this proposed constitutional amendment a right which ought not to be denied to them. I have sufficient confidence in the American people to believe that they can be trusted absolutely to say who shall be President of the United States and to determine whether a man who has once been President is fit to be President again.

It would have been a melancholy day for this country if we had been unable to elect to a second term George Washington or Abraham Lincoln. No man can tell when a situation will arise when it might be a vital necessity to retain for a second term a President then in office. We might be engaged in a war where it would be the veriest misfortune conceivable to say that the man at the head of the Government should be changed at the end of four years.

I think we can safely let this matter remain where it is. I have no fear that we shall have any perpetual President. I have too much confidence in the American people and in their good sense for that. I have no fear that they can not be fully trusted with the power to say whether a man shall serve a second time or a third time if he seeks it, and I think we are running a very great risk in taking up this limitation as to eligibility for a second term.

I have no desire to enter into further details, Mr. President. I simply wished to put upon the record the reasons which will govern me in voting against this resolution.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I want to make just a single observation in reference to this matter.

The Senator from Massachusetts has said, and others have said here, that this is an attempt to take from the people their power to elect a President to successive terms. I do not understand that it is any such attempt at all. It is a proposition to submit to the people the question whether or not they will take from themselves that power. In the last analysis it will rest in the good judgment of a majority of the people of the United States—indeed, more than a simple majority, because it will require three-fourths of the States to ratify this proposed constitutional amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I am of course aware that this is a constitutional amendment which must be submitted to the people, and that it could not be adopted without the votes of three-fourths of the States. I know that. What I referred to was the attempt in this resolution itself. What it aims at is a limitation on the powers of the people. If the people choose to take from themselves their own existing right, that is their affair; but the matter has not reached that stage yet.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My position is that this is a matter that the people of the United States have been discussing for a long time. We do know that there is a sentiment, a very large sentiment—precisely how large we do not know—in the United States in favor of this proposed amendment. Let the people of the United States say whether they want it or not. If they determine that they do, then a majority of the people will have spoken upon it.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President is it in order to offer an amendment at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; there is one amendment pending. The Senator can have his proposed amendment read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. PAYNTER. Then I ask that it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the section the following:

Provided, That the term of the incumbent in the office of President when this amendment takes effect shall be for six years.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that when his amendment is offered it ought to follow the word "election," in line 10, rather than to follow the resolution itself.

Mr. PAYNTER. That is what I was about to suggest.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to suggest, further, that there is pending an amendment, submitted by the Senator from Georgia, striking out "six years" and inserting "four years." If that amendment should be adopted, then the proposed amendment of the Senator from Kentucky would not be necessary, even from his point of view.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President, I will not discuss the question of the necessity for the adoption of the pending amendment to the Constitution. My amendment was prepared simply for the purpose of suggesting an idea that was in my mind. I have drawn it hastily, and perhaps it is rather dangerous to amend the Constitution by words that are added in the midst of a debate.

The conditions are these: If this amendment as reported should be adopted, the question would arise at the close of the incoming administration—if the amendment should become effective before the close of it—as to whether the President then in office would hold office for the term of six years or for only four. That question would necessarily arise, and it would be necessary to give this amendment interpretation to determine the effect of it.

In a matter so important as fixing the term of the President no question should be left open for decision. The amendment should make it perfectly clear whether the term of the person then in the office of President should be six or four years. That, of course, is upon the idea that it is made a six-year term. Of course if it remains a four-year term, then the amendment which I have suggested would not be proper at all, because I have no purpose or desire to see the term of the incumbent when the amendment is adopted made longer than that of his predecessors or successors.

So, Mr. President, if this amendment does not meet with the approval of the Senate, some provision ought to be added to the pending resolution which will take care of the situation which I have suggested—that is, the possibility of controversy at the end of the term in the event the resolution is adopted in its present form.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I should like to hear the amendment submitted by the Senator from Kentucky read again. I did not clearly get it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment proposed by the committee, on page 2, line 10, after the word "election," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the term of the incumbent in the office of President when this amendment takes effect shall be for six years.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DIXON. I yield.

Mr. PAYNTER. There is one suggestion which I intended to make, but neglected to make. The incoming President was nominated and elected upon the idea that it was for a four-year term. If this amendment should be adopted, he would be disqualified—if that is the proper interpretation of the amendment—from holding office for more than four years. It seems to me it would not be fair to him to deprive him of a six-year term when this is adopted after he has been elected to the present ensuing term.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky whether or not that was the understanding of the present President elect, Woodrow Wilson, that he is to serve only one term of four years?

Mr. PAYNTER. I am discussing a constitutional question now, not what may have been the understanding.

Mr. DIXON. But I understood the Senator from Kentucky to say that that was the understanding of the present President elect.

Mr. PAYNTER. As I said, I am discussing the constitutional question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand perfectly well that if the resolution should be adopted as it comes from the committee, it would be wise to make it specific—that is, to place it beyond any controversy as to its application. But there is an amendment pending to the resolution, offered by the senior Senator from Georgia. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky is not an amendment to that amendment, but it is an amendment to the original resolution, and therefore can not properly be offered at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa correctly states the parliamentary situation. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky is not in order now.

Mr. CUMMINS. Therefore, while of course I do not want to limit the remarks that may be made upon any subject that may be pertinent to the question, I suggest that the Senator from Kentucky withhold his amendment until it becomes in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggested that it would be read merely for the information of the Senate.

Mr. PAYNTER. I understood the Chair so to rule.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. DIXON. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. May I have the attention of the Senator from Kentucky for a moment? While I think it is an inadvertence, the Senator from Kentucky, in his amendment, has omitted any reference to the Vice President.

Mr. PAYNTER. I have not studied that question, but I think my amendment includes the Vice President. As I suggested in my former remarks, it is rather an unsafe thing to accept an amendment offered under these circumstances. More time ought to be taken for its consideration. I think the question important enough for the Senate to take an abundance of time to consider it.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I understand——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Montana will permit the Chair to make an observation, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is not now in the Senate; and the Chair desires to read from the RECORD precisely what occurred on the 15th of August last in reference to the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS said:

Mr. President, I have been informed that there are some others who desire to speak upon this joint resolution, but that they are not prepared to proceed this afternoon. I know also the very great anxiety of some Senators that we shall take up the calendar. In view of those circumstances, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. BACON. Before that is done I wish to offer an amendment to the joint resolution in order that it may be stated, and then I shall make no objection to the request.

Subsequent to that, and after some debate had occurred, Mr. BACON said:

I simply desire to offer an amendment, and I will ask the Secretary to take it down. It is on the sixth line on the the second page, to strike out the word "six" and to insert the word "four." I do not ask to do anything more now than to have that entered.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, no formal amendment having been offered, but merely a suggestion having been made by the Senator from Georgia, to clarify the situation and leave no loophole for further constitutional construction and the possible embarrassment of the incoming President of the United States, I desire to offer a specific amendment. I should like to have the Secretary read it, if it is in order to have it offered at this time. If it is not in order, I will present it later in the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will rule that, upon the statement just read, the suggested amendment on the part of the Senator from Georgia is not now pending. The Senator from Montana offers the amendment which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 10, after the word "election," it is proposed to insert the following words:

Provided, That this provision shall not apply to the President elect, Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. DIXON. I hope the Senator who reported the resolution, or the one who introduced it, will accept this amendment, as it would clear up the embarrassment and any possible doubt that might arise as to the status of the President elect, as suggested by the Senator from Kentucky.

Personally I have not heard any great demand from the country for this constitutional amendment, which would forever prohibit the people of the United States, when they thought best so to do, from reelecting a faithful President for a second term. Candidly, I think the purpose of this resolution would have been better stated, and it would have come nearer telling the cold truth, if it had been entitled—

A proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution for the relief of certain aspirants for the office of President of the United States.

Outside of a very select circle of prospective presidential candidates, I think there has been no demand from the people themselves to have the Federal Constitution amended in this respect. As the Senator from Massachusetts said, if it had been in operation from the beginning of the Government it would have forbidden George Washington's second election; it would have forbidden this Nation to have had the services of Abraham Lincoln in the greatest crisis this Government has ever faced; it would have eliminated William McKinley from his second term; it would have eliminated Andrew Jackson from his second term. In all seriousness, boiled down to the real essence of the matter, I think it would be better entitled—

A bill for the relief of certain presidential candidates now occupying to a greater or less extent the political stage.

This resolution seeks to revive the old rule that used to prevail in many congressional districts—to "pass the honors around." Until the last few years in some congressional districts there was an unwritten law that no man could "represent the district for more than two terms," not because such a rule gave better service in the House of Representatives, but in order that certain aspiring politicians of the district might have an opportunity to go to Congress. It was not for the benefit of the people; it was not for the benefit of the Government; but it was purely and simply in the interest of certain ambitious gentlemen in that particular congressional district.

We know the result. It used to be a standing joke that the "two-term districts" in the House of Representatives were usually less ably represented than any other districts in the country.

Theoretically, the argument for this amendment is based on the fear of some great overshadowing personality perpetually assuming the presidential office. They talk about the power of Federal patronage in the hands of the President. They fear that a man holding the power of appointing thousands of Federal officers is invulnerable, so far as his reelection is concerned.

I now want to testify that while we have seen the power of Federal patronage prostituted by the Executive, the worst examples of the prostitution of Federal patronage have emanated from the Senate Chamber, instead of from the White House. The old senatorial oligarchy that held legislation and held control of the Senate in the hollow of its hands committed far greater crimes in the matter of the use of Federal patronage for personal, private ends that any President who ever occupied the White House. If the argument applies to a second term for the President, it applies with equal force to a second term for every Senator in this Chamber. If a man becomes dangerous by reason of his power of distributing Federal patronage—and that is all of the argument behind the proposed resolution—the same consideration applies with even greater force to the Members of this body. No President distributed Federal patronage by himself. With the power of confirmation lodged in the Senate, Federal patronage is distributed much more largely by the Members of the Senate than by the President.

There is no possible fear, Senators, that any man, occupying the position of President, can ever force his reelection by the use of patronage. There is no possibility that any man can perpetuate his power as President by the power which comes from occupying that position temporarily.

It is true that under the old system of nominations in conventions the power of patronage was tremendous. It was used to renominate Senator after Senator. It was used in a lesser degree to renominate Congressmen by the distribution of post offices in the district. But it has never yet, and it never will in the future, reelect any man to any office within the gift of the people.

We saw within the last year a President force his own renomination from the hands of an unwilling political party by the use of Federal patronage. The Senate remembers the incident, last February, when 10 nominations which had been sent to the Senate affecting post offices and collectorships in a certain Southern State were withdrawn en bloc and, in effect, put up to the highest bidder for delegates to the Republican national convention. While the use of patronage might have yielded delegates under the old plan of presidential nominations, it did not bring results in the elections. Last November the people of the United States in no uncertain terms expressed their opinion of a nomination forced by an Executive by the misuse of Federal patronage. You fear shadows, gentlemen, and not actual realities.

There will never be another President of the United States nominated under the old system. I think I am on fairly safe ground when I make that prophecy. The presidential preference primary is already here in 12 or 15 States, and within the coming four years, during President Elect Wilson's administration, I predict it will be put into effect in a majority of the States.
